Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: By to-night's paper I see that you are urging the passing of the bill to prevent profiteering. My mother, Mrs. Emma Dent Casey (a sister of the late Mrs. U. S. Grant), who is 83 years old and in a wheeling chair, and I have been notified to leave the Cairo, where we have lived two years, by September 12, in order that they make our rooms into hotel rooms and get transient rates for them.

I am employed at the United States Food Administration all day, and therefore have no time to look for another place, even if there were one to be found.

Mr. Schneider, the owner of the Cairo, is raising the rent on almost everyone in the building, except, of course, those whom he is evicting.

I do hope something can be done in time to prevent my mother being evicted, and me from being forced to give up my position and move away from Washington, as it is impossible for me to find a place within my means at this time.

Very sincerely, EMMA DENT CASEY.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I merely wish to offer an amendment. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wish to add to what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has just had read into the RECORD, that yesterday I received a telephone message from a lady, the wife of a soldier who is now serving his country, asking me if there was any truth in the statement which had been made by her landlord that the present law protecting lessees would be repealed by October 1 and that she would have to sign another contract for a very much increased rental or else would be evicted. This lady also informed me that in order to force tenants to sign the leases the landlord had taken away from them certain privileges. For instance, he had refused to allow them to fill their ice boxes in some cases, and in others had threatened to charge extra for giving them the benefit of the service of a telephone. I informed this lady that she need have no fear; that Congress would not modify the so-called Saulsbury resolution; that we hoped to get another law through that would be an improvement over it by October 1, and I advised her to sign no new lease. I am glad the Senator from Ohio has offered the amendment. I certainly think it is very apt and that it ought to be passed, and will be passed, by the House without any division.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment; but if there be a Senator here who will arise in his place and say that he fears it may impede the progress of the pending bill, I will withdraw it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, is it an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. No.

Mr. POMERENE. The pending amendment has not been acted upon.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am very heartily in favor of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Before the vote is taken I suggest that the Secretary be authorized to change the numbers of the sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I was about to say, there is no Senator who is more anxious to see the pending bill enacted into law, and enacted speedily, than I. I am going to propose an amendment in a moment, but if any Senator believes that the amendment I shall propose might have a tendency to retard for a day the passage of the pending bill, I shall withdraw it. Mr. President, we are faced with a practical situation. I am not permitted and I have no disposition to refer to any situation with reference to any other body of Congress, but an impassé is about to be reached, I fear, where it will be practically impossible to secure legislation except on bills of commanding importance, such as war legislation.

The Senate about three months ago passed a bill proposing to permit metalliferous mining on Indian reservations. I ask the patience of Senators in regard to this matter because it relates to the war. I pointed out in the broken speeches I made when that bill was pending that there are on Indian reservations metalliferous minerals such as manganese, chromite, and other substances which the Government needs, and needs immediately. The bill was very thoroughly argued, and its opponents were apparently reconciled to it. It has been reported favorably by the House Committee on Indian Affairs, and I can not see how if as it passed the Senate it were to be attached to the pending bill it could in any sense impede the progress of that measure. Therefore, Mr. President, as an amendment to this bill I offer in the exact form in which it was passed by this body on June 18 what is known as Senate bill No. 385, being to authorize mining and prospecting for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations. It has no relation to oil; it has no relation to coal; but to metalliferous minerals only. It is quite lengthy, and has been printed in the RECORD nearly a dozen times. I will ask that it be stated.

The amendment offered by Mr. ASHURST is as follows:

After the amendment last adopted insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States or to any association of such persons or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof, any part of the unallotted lands within any Indian reservation within the States of Arizona, California, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Washington, or Wyoming heretofore withdrawn from entry under the mining laws for the purpose of mining for deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals, which leases shall be irrevocable, except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

"SEC. —. That after the passage and approval of this act unallotted lands, or such portion thereof as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine, within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for the discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States, and after such declaration mining claims may be located by such citizens in the same manner as mining claims are located under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the locators of all such mining claims, or their heirs, successors, or assigns, shall have a preference right to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a lease, under the terms and conditions of this act, within one year after the date of the location of any mining claim, and any such locator who shall fail to apply for a lease within one year from the date of location shall forfeit all rights to such mining claim: Provided further, That duplicate copies of the location notice shall be filed within 60 days with the superintendent in charge of the reservation on which the mining claim is located, and that application for a lease under this act may be filed with such superintendent for transmission through official channels to the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That lands containing springs, water holes, or other bodies of water needed or used by the Indians for watering live stock, irrigation, or water-power purposes shall not be designated by the Secretary of the Interior as subject to entry under this act.

"SEC. —. That leases under this act shall be for a period of 30 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the lessee may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease.

"SEC. —. That in addition to areas of mineral land to be included in leases under this act the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may grant to the lessee the right to use during the life of the lease a tract of unoccupied land, not exceeding 80 acres in area, for camp sites, milling, smelting, and refining works, and for other purposes connected with and necessary to the proper development and use of the deposits covered by the lease.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use of the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits therein: Provided, That the said Secretary, during the life of the lease, is hereby authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved.

SEC. —. That any successor in interest or assignee of any lease granted under this act, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

SEC. —. That any lease granted under this act may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceedings in the United States district court for the district in which said property or some part thereof is situated whenever the lessee, after reasonable notice in writing, as prescribed in the lease, shall fail to comply with the terms of this act or with such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be specifically recited in the lease.

SEC. —. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the mineral deposits in the ground covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States, for the benefit of the Indians, a royalty which shall not be less than 5 per cent of the net value of the output of the minerals at the mine, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the extraction of the minerals from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter on the area covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year thereafter; 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively: and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

SEC. —. That in addition to the payment of the royalties and rentals as herein provided the lessee shall expend annually not less than $100 in development work for each mining claim located or leased in the same manner as an annual expenditure for labor or improvements is required to be made under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the lessee shall also agree to pay all damages occasioned by reason of his mining operations to the land or allotment of any Indian or to the crops or improvements thereon: And provided further, That no timber shall be cut upon the reservation by the lessee except after first obtaining a permit from the superintendent of the reservation and upon payment of the fair value thereof.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the books and accounts of lessees, and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of mining, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

SEC. —. That all moneys received from royalties and rentals under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the reservation where the leased land is located, which moneys shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for their education, support, and civilization.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the interests of the Indians and for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the right of the State or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee.

SEC. —. That mining locations, under the terms of this act, may be made on unallotted lands within Indian reservations by Indians who have heretofore or may hereafter be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be competent to manage their own affairs; and the said Secretary is hereby authorized and empowered to lease such lands to such Indians in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit other Indians to make locations and obtain leases under the provisions of this act, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in regard to the working, developing, disposition, and selling of the products, and the disposition of the proceeds thereof of any such mine by such Indians.

SEC. —. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes and Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma.

SEC. —. That hereafter no public lands of the United States shall be withdrawn by Executive order, proclamation, or otherwise, for or as an Indian reservation except by act of Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator if my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] did not oppose the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say that the Senator's colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] was very much opposed to the bill, as was the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. They both ably argued the question, and I am sure that no additional argument could be made against the bill. I regret that they are both absent, and I will not ask, therefore, for final action on the amendment this evening.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest that that be done.

Mr. ASHURST. In view of the absence of the two Senators, the only two who, so far as I know, are opposed to the bill, I shall not ask final action this evening.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We hope to get the bill through this evening.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I will ask that the Senators referred to be sent for.

I just wish to say, further, that if any Senator feels that an unfair advantage is being taken or feels that it might impede the progress of this bill one day I will withdraw the amendment right now. Yet let me tell you—and it is no secret; we all know it—that these minerals which I have named over and over again are needed by the Government, and that after this provision goes into effect prospectors' leases must be taken out, the prospecting must be done, the mines must be opened, and at the earliest not much could be done before the 1st of January. Hence the necessity for no delay. If we wait until December or January to have this bill passed in the other body of Congress, we will be delayed until March, April, or May; and some of these metals are needed now, such as manganese and others that I have mentioned.

I hope most earnestly, therefore, that there will be no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what the difficulty is in the other body in getting action upon the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator asks what the difficulty is. If I desired to do so, or if I were familiar with the parliamentary situation, I would not be permitted to make any statements as to what might transpire in any other body of Congress; but I simply say this——

Mr. LENROOT. No; what I meant was, Is it a parliamentary difficulty or a difficulty in coming to an agreement between those having different views? Is it a parliamentary difficulty in getting the bill up?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, no.

Mr. LENROOT. Or is it a matter of disagreement between those holding different views in regard to the merits of the measure?

Mr. ASHURST. The bill which passed the Senate has been reported favorably by the House committee. I apprehend that there will be some difficulty in getting the bill up for passage. I do not apprehend that there will be any objection to its passage, however, because it passed the House two years ago.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator know whether the House committee was unanimous or whether there was any opposition in the committee?

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I want to give the Senator all the information I have. I never have been advised that there was any opposition. I talked with four or five members of the committee, leading members of both political parties, and they did not state to me that there was any opposition. Of course, they did not state that there was none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator does not know whether the bill has been called up in the House under what they know as the unanimous-consent rule?

Mr. ASHURST. No; it never has been called up; but let me repeat that it has been reported favorably by the House committee, and the bill passed the House about a year and a half ago; so I think I am within the bounds of reason in assuming that there is no serious opposition to it in the House. Let me say, also, that it has been changed a little in some particulars as against the way in which it passed the House, and changed to meet the views of those who were opposed to it in committee before.

I tender the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] is desirous of having an opportunity to consult with other Senators. Therefore I will withdraw the amendment temporarily. I ask that it lie on the desk, and I will call it up at a later hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments? The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and subject to amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether a vote has been taken upon the amendment beginning on line 22 of page 3?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that it has been agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will reserve an amendment that I want to offer until the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I see that the chairman of the committee is present, and I should like to ask him a question about the amendment to which the Senator from Colorado has just referred. I want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether he would have any objection to changing the amount of $300 to $500? That was the amount that the Senator from Montana suggested in his amendment. The amount that was suggested to me by the convention to which I referred in my colloquy with him was a minimum of $800. I see that the amount here is a maximum of $300. It seems to me that that is really too small if we are going to enact any legislation along this line, and I just wanted to know whether the Senator would have any objection to making it $500 instead of $300?

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that change being made at this time, and considering it further in conference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the action on the amendment may be reconsidered, in order that I may offer that amendment to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. It appears that there is no objection, and it is now subject to amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move to strike out "$300," in line 3, page 4, and insert "$500."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I move to further amend the proviso by striking out the words "on credit," at the end of line 25, on page 3, and all on page 4, beginning after the word "meridian," on line 2, down to the word "Provided," on line 17, so that the amendment as amended would read:

> That of said sum $2,500,000 is hereby made available to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture, if in his judgment the public interest requires it, to purchase seed wheat and to supply the same to farmers in the Great Plains area west of the ninety-eighth meridian.

The purpose of my amendment is to enable the Government to supply this seed to the farmers directly, and without going through the formula of a loan.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before that amendment is acted upon—and I think I shall vote for it—I should like a little explanation from the chairman of the committee. I do not know but that my inquiry will be directed more to the Secretary of Agriculture than to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but I hope it will pass at least from him to the Secretary.

I observe that the amendment on pages 3 and 4, which is now under discussion again, provides:

> And the Secretary is further empowered to prescribe proper rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions hereof.

I also notice that a portion of the bill is exactly, word for word, the same as a portion of the rules and regulations that have been adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the provision for the use of $5,000,000 of a certain fund for the purpose of purchasing seed wheat; and I want to point out some of the weaknesses of the provision in the rules that have been adopted.

First, I wish to note that in an extract from the Official Bulletin of August 3, 1918, page 9, relating to these advances, we have this:

> Each borrower will be required, as a part of his contract, to agree that if his yield is 7 bushels per acre or more he will pay into a guaranty fund a sum equal to 25 per cent of the amount loaned him, to cover any losses that may occur. If the amount so contributed exceeds the actual loss by the Government, the excess will be returned pro rata to the contributors.

This seed grain, then, will be furnished to the farmer only on condition that if he raises grain amounting to about half a crop, he shall take 25 per cent of his entire crop and put it into a guaranty fund. Now, as this is for the benefit of those who have no credit at the bank and can not purchase the seed wheat themselves, I submit that if a farmer raises only half of a crop, which is about 7 bushels per acre, with the present cost of raising that crop, there will be no part of it that he can possibly turn over into a guaranty fund, because it will certainly take one-half of the crop to pay the expense of raising it. If we are really to benefit the farmer we ought not to impose any such exaction upon him; and I hope that if this bill goes through in any form, appropriating money for the purpose of purchasing seed wheat, the Department of Agriculture will not impose this onerous condition upon everyone who is to receive a benefit under it.

Nor is this the only thing to which I object. Here again we find, under the regulations that are sent out by the Agricultural Department, known as Joint Circular No. 1, and entitled "Regulations as to Farmers' Seed-Grain Loans in Drought-Stricken Districts," the following:

> Seed-grain loans may be made to farmers in areas determined by the Department of Agriculture to have suffered two successive crop failures from severe drought or winter killing.

Mr. President, if the farmer suffered only one crop failure he will not come under the provisions of these regulations, although he may have no means whatever for purchasing seed wheat. I know certain sections of my State where the farmers lost last year, not by drought but by hail, all of their grain. This year they have lost their entire acreage of grain by reason of drought. Now, there have been two successive losses; but inasmuch as one is a hail loss and the other is a drought loss, under the provisions of these regulations the farmer so suffering could receive no relief whatever; and even if there has been only one loss by drought, and the farmer is without credit, I should like to have the Senator in charge of this bill, or the Secretary of Agriculture, inform me upon what theory he would refuse to grant this farmer the relief that he proposes to grant to those who have lost two successive crops. The purpose is to enable the farmer to crop again next year, and it makes little difference to the Government whether his poverty comes through a loss of one year or whether it comes through a loss of two years. He may only have had a half crop one year. That would not be a total loss, and then he might have had a complete failure the second year.

I hope that the Secretary of Agriculture will modify that provision. I am going to refer to a third one, and then the Senator can answer for the Secretary or answer as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is this: The same provision, section 6, reads:

The amount approved for loan pursuant to these regulations will be paid by the proper Federal land bank to the applicant, or on his written order, upon receipt by such Federal land bank of the following documents—

Now, these are the documents that he must preserve:

(a) Certificate of planting, signed by an authorized representative of the Department of Agriculture, that a number of acres sufficient under these regulations to warrant a loan in the amount approved have been properly planted with proper seed. Such certificate shall be in the form attached to these regulations. The names and signatures of such authorized representatives will be filed with the several Federal land banks by the Department of Agriculture.

Thus you will see that by that provision it is intended that only those farmers who can not secure credit at the local bank shall receive the benefits of the provisions relating to the distribution of seed grain. Now, inasmuch as those who have no credit at the bank must first purchase their seed wheat and plant it before they can make a loan from the Government or through the governmental banks, I should like to ask the Senator and the Secretary of Agriculture how such a farmer will secure the credit to buy the grain to plant. If he can get credit at the bank to purchase the grain, it certainly seems to me that he does not need the assistance of the Department of Agriculture; and if he can not borrow the money at the bank, it certainly seems to me that the Secretary of Agriculture ought not to require him to seed the land before there will be loaned him a sufficient amount to purchase the seed itself.

I hope, Mr. President, that those two provisions will be stricken out of the rules; and I wish that we could so modify the bill itself that it would be impossible to make a rule of that kind.

Right here I want to call attention to another matter, a suggestion by the present coal administrator of the State of North Dakota, and that is that it would be far better if a portion of this five-million or six-million dollar fund should be diverted for the purpose of insuring the crop. If the farmer could have his crop insured against hail and against drought, he undoubtedly could secure from the local banks a sufficient amount of money to purchase the seed wheat, and that would relieve the Government from the necessity of investing at all in the seed grain.

I suggest that not only to the Secretary of Agriculture but to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was unavoidably called from the Chamber. May I inquire as to the amendment which is now pending?

Mr. McKELLAR. I was about to ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, as amended, will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That of said sum $2,500,000 is hereby made available to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture, if in his judgment the public interest requires it, to purchase seed wheat and to supply the same to farmers in the Great Plains area west of the ninety-eighth meridian: Provided further, That when the Secretary purchases such seed from any one other than the producer thereof, he shall not pay such dealer or intermediary a net profit of more than 10 cents per bushel above cost of such seed to such dealer or intermediary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the amendment as amended, the other portion of it having been stricken out. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment as amended. [Puting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it. The "noes" have it, and the amendment is lost. It therefore necessarily goes out of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I sent to the desk some time ago. I will not ask that the amendment regarding metalliferous mining be read, although I think it ought to go into the RECORD, but that would be the sixth or seventh time it has gone into the RECORD. I wish to say to Senators that I am tendering it exactly in the same form that it passed the Senate. Senators will remember that there was considerable discussion as to the various terms, but the way in which I have sent it to the desk is the exact form in which it passed the Senate.

I now ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, this amendment is the same as a bill which has been before the Senate several times and has been reported out of the Committee on Indian Affairs a number of times. It was finally passed by the Senate after full debate and is now pending in the House. It relates to the leasing of metalliferous mines in the State of Arizona that are contained in Indian reservations. The measure was fought by several of the Senators, among whom were both the Senators from Utah and myself. At last there was eliminated from the bill at that time all reference to any State except the State of Arizona. Is that correct?

Mr. ASHURST. No; permit me to say to the Senator——

Mr. SHAFROTH. At least there was eliminated from the bill the leasing of any metalliferous mines in Indian reservations in the State of Colorado and in the State of Utah.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me name to the Senator the States to which the bill applies as it passed the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall be glad if the Senator will do so.

Mr. ASHURST. Arizona, California, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Washington, and Wyoming, excluding, of course, the State which the Senator in part represents, Colorado, and Utah.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to make the prediction as to the result of the passage of this amendment, that it will be a failure, as has been the coal-leasing bill for coal lands in Alaska. I am thoroughly convinced that it is not to the interest of the people of any State in the Union to permit metalliferous mines to be leased. It has not been the policy of the Government at any time to do so. The precious metals have always been regarded as of a sacred nature by all governments, because of the fact that those metals constitute the measure of value of everything else in the world. It has, therefore, been to the interest of all governments to encourage in every way possible the production of the precious metals. To such an extent is this true that nearly every government has the free coinage of gold in order to encourage the production of gold, and there was a time when the free coinage of silver prevailed in almost every country.

Mr. President, if there ever was a time in the history of the world when precious metals were needed it is now, and I feel confident that a leasing system will not permit the production of the metals to the extent that the present laws do. When the prospector finds he will have to pay a royalty on the mineral he discovers and produces, and that he must be under the control of a bureau two or three thousand miles away, he will conclude he can do better in some other business. When he realizes that he can not borrow money on a mine for the purpose of development, upon a title which can be forfeited the next day, he will conclude that he will not prospect for mines. For that reason it seems to me that we are passing a law now that is going to discourage instead of encourage the production of that which measures everything else on earth. Inasmuch as there is now in existence in the world billions and billions of credit money that ought to be redeemed in precious-metal money, the need of the governments of the world for the production of these precious metals becomes greater every day.

Mr. President, Russia has issued twenty-nine times as much uncovered paper money as existed at the beginning of the war; and there has been issued by all of the allied nations in uncovered paper money, I think, about fourteen times as much as existed prior to the beginning of the war in 1914. When the superstructure is fourteen times greater than it was four years ago the base upon which it rests must be increased enormously in order to maintain specie payments. It is absurd to adopt any policy that will have a tendency to discourage the production of gold, instead of that which has been tried and has produced such wonderful results in the United States. Inasmuch as the Senator from Arizona feels otherwise, however, I propose not to filibuster against the amendment and not to discuss it at length. I propose to content myself with voting against it and making the prediction that the day will come when every State to which this law will be applicable will regret its passage, because of the fact that there will be no development compared to that which will exist in the States where the present system of entry and location exists.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona.

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I move be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, insert after line 17 the following:

Such part, not exceeding 20 per cent of the amount appropriated for any of the foregoing items embraced in any particular group numbered first to sixth, inclusive, as the Secretary of Agriculture may find not to be required for carrying out the purposes of such item may, by his order, from time to time, be transferred to and used for the purposes of any other such items in the same group as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the very great danger in voting to place an item of this kind in the bill. A lump-sum appropriation is bad enough, but when we vote an appropriation and provide that any officer of the Government can just pass it around from one purpose to another, it is a kind of legislation that we ought not to agree to. It is not fair and just to the American people to use their money in any such slipshod way. This may pass. I do not know. I am not saying anything about it, except that I am going to vote against it, and I deplore any such legislation. I think it is unworthy of this body.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I want to say there is a great deal of weight in the objection which the Senator from Tennessee has urged against this amendment, generally speaking, but its justification depends upon the circumstance that this is an exceptional bill. It is not a regular appropriation bill. It will undoubtedly disappear from legislation within the next year or two. The organization——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says it will pass away. There has been an effort in every bill since I have been a Member of this body, if my recollection is correct, to put such a provision not only in this bill but in other bills of a similar kind. It seems to be a very popular provision in the departments. It is all wrong. It is no answer to say that this is an unusual bill. I grant it. I believe we all grant it. Nevertheless we should be vigilant about this kind of appropriations. It is very dangerous to give this discretion to an officer; and that does not mean the Secretary of Agriculture. It means to give to some man in the department who is not described, whom we do not know, the right to change these appropriations from one purpose to another. It may be that this money would be expended in a way that was never intended by this body and the coordinate body of Congress. We ought not to permit it. If the department wants money to carry on certain functions, I am always willing to give it, if it is wise and proper. But it is not wise and proper that they should ask for a revolving fund to pass from one purpose to another, to create a migratory fund like the one proposed.

I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will withdraw the amendment and not ask us to vote down an amendment of this kind.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I may say that this amendment was prepared by the Department of Agriculture and transmitted to me with a request that it be offered. There is no doubt the Senator's objections would be unanswerable if this were a regular appropriation bill. This, however, is a special appropriation bill. The Senate has voted that it is no appropriation bill at all. It will soon pass from our calendar and will not be a recurring appropriation bill to be passed every year. The organization based upon the antecedent of this bill, which was the measure approved August 10 of last year, was improvised in a few months. It has not been thoroughly standardized. It has not been possible to make an accurate estimate as to what the various services require. It may happen that a sufficient fund has not been estimated for some particular activity and that the activity will be crippled. These are all war activities, I may remark, and the activities may be crippled and embarrassed for lack of funds. On the other hand, due to the fact that work has not been standardized, there may be an excessive appropriation for some particular activity. This amendment is designed——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. In one moment. This amendment is designed to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to keep these various activities going forward and obviate the necessity of a deficiency appropriation. I repeat that, generally speaking, I am as much opposed to legislation of this sort as the Senator from Tennessee.

I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The various items in the bill have been fixed, I understand, upon the recommendations of the department, which named various sums as necessary.

Mr. GORE. That is true.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Can the amendment the Senator just offered be justified on any theory other than that the Department of Agriculture in making estimates was not sure of itself, and they therefore want some leeway to manipulate the funds to cover deficiencies in the estimates?

Mr. GORE. I think that is true. I think the department is not sure of its own estimates, and it is due to the fact——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GORE. In just one moment. That is due to the fact that the entire organization for this war service is a new organization. It has had less than one year's experience and it has not been possible in the nature of things to forecast all the requirements of the various activities. It is a difficulty originating from the very nature of the situation. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that be true, is it not all the more reason, when dealing with large sums like the sums appropriated in this bill for various purposes, if they do not know themselves what they want this money for, that we should exercise not extraordinary care but just plain, everyday, ordinary care? Ought we not to hold some rein over them?

Mr. GORE. I think we ought to hold a very stringent rein over all the departments with respect to items that can be estimated for within an assured degree of foresight and certainty.

Mr. McKELLAR. Congress is in session all the time, I will say to the Senator, and if they have other demands made on them and other projects and other plans, it is easy enough for them to make recommendations to Congress. It certainly can not be said that this Congress has been niggardly with this department or any other department during the war. It seems to me they ought to be satisfied with the sums we have given them without having this revolving fund.

Mr. GORE. Of course, while this is objectionable legislation, I think the creation of deficiencies is also an objectionable policy. We are forced to do one or the other if this work is to be carried forward. We must either force the department to create a deficiency or discontinue the service or else insert the proviso which I have sent to the desk.

There is no sort of human foresight, I take it, that can look into the future and estimate with perfect precision as to the requirements of these different services. Of course, if we have reached the conclusion that the service is not necessary or required, or that the Secretary ought not to be vested with this discretion, there is only one course left for the Senate to pursue.

I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee, as the bill stands at present with such amendments as the Senate has put on, what is the total amount that it carries?

Mr. GORE. The direct appropriations amount to about $12,000,000. There is a proviso, however, bringing over $6,000,000 that was appropriated last year. Making that a part of the total it would aggregate about $18,000,000 or $19,000,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is all the bill carries at present?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In its entirety?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is less than I had supposed it was, I will say, but I regard the amendment just offered, in spite of the fact that it is was drawn and approved by the department, as constituting an exceedingly unfortunate, not to say improper, legislative procedure. It provides as follows:

Such part, not exceeding 20 per cent of the amount appropriated for any of the foregoing items, embraced in any particular group numbered first to sixth, inclusive, as the Secretary of Agriculture may find not to be required for carrying out the purposes of such item, may, by his order, from time to time be transferred to and used for the purposes of any other such items in the same group as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary.

Mr. President, the vice of that sort of legislation, in my opinion, is this: The Committee on Agriculture, after such hearings and consideration as it has been able to afford to this subject matter, decides that a certain amount of money is required for a certain specific purpose and reports in favor of appropriating it, and we vote it after their explanation. This amendment will leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to say, "Why, this money is not required, 20 per cent, one fifth of the whole amount, for a certain group of specific objects that Congress in its wisdom has enumerated, and, in my judgment, certain other things that Congress limited to a certain fixed amount require more money, and therefore this money that Congress appropriated to one subject I will appropriate it to another."

The Senator from Oklahoma says if that is not done some work must cease. That may be so, but when Congress appropriates a certain sum of money for a particular purpose and decrees in advance that that work shall cease when it comes to that limit, if the department wants to exceed its authority and go further it takes its chance upon whether Congress will approve the specified object in a deficiency bill making up a deficit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is good policy that we expend 20 per cent of the twelve or eighteen million dollars, whichever it may be, does the Senator see any reason why it would not be equally as good policy for the whole amount to be turned over as a lump sum to the Secretary of Agriculture? Would that not be better than to hamper him by confining his use of it to a 20 per cent proposition?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so, Mr. President. Of course, the 20 per cent necessarily must be arrived at in a purely arbitrary manner. It is a matter of guesswork, and it differs only in degree from allowing the discretion to the Secretary to divert 100 per cent of the appropriation to an entirely different purpose; in other words, the Secretary is to be allowed the discretion to hamstring certain propositions by cutting off one part of the money that Congress appropriated for objects because in his opinion it is not required. We know what the word "required" means, how elastically it can be construed in the mind of a Secretary. If he does not like the work or the object, he will state it is not required for this purpose, and some other fad that he may have—not to use offensive language, but some project that he is partial to—can easily, when he is not required to account for his discretion or give any reason for it whatever except his whim, be diverted to the things that he thinks are more important than Congress thought they were.

I have no particular interest in this matter except, in my judgment, it is a piece of unwise legislation, and it is in line with what we are doing every day, abandoning the functions of Congress, debasing the legislative branch of the Government, and exalting the executive branch of the Government, and then complaining about it afterwards.

I am especially opposed to this amendment for the reason announced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. If it were possible that Congress was going to adjourn for a long period and leave these war demands in the nature of possible emergencies without proper attention there would be some justification for giving this discretion to some one of the executive departments, but we are going to be in almost continuous session here. We are lucky if we get three-day recesses from now until November, and then another session of Congress meets the first of December. I for one do not like abandoning the control of one-fifth of all these appropriations to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture during that brief time, when Congress can keep control of them without embarrassing the service at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite attention to pages 4 and 5 and move to strike out all of lines 23, 24, and 25 on page 4, and all of page 5 down to and including line 23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. KING. I ask for a division.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us know what the amendment is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We do not understand the amendment. I wish the Secretary would read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Secretary read as follows:

Third, for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products, for the following stated purposes and in amounts as follows: Cereal-smut eradication, $50,000; peanut conservation and utilization, $15,000; control of cotton, truck, and forage-crop diseases, $117,550; farm storage of sweet potatoes, $30,000; location of Irish-potato seed stock, $7,500; plant-disease survey, $23,000; castor-bean production and utilization, $20,000; maintenance of field-bean seed supply, $10,000; production of cereals and grain sorghums, $53,250; sugar-beet nematode work, $10,000; pathological inspection of fruits during processes of marketing, $18,000; control of a new sugar-cane disease, $20,000; production of rice, $5,000; control of cereal and forage insects, $55,000; control of stored-product insects, $22,000; control of vegetable and truck-crop insects, $35,000; control of sweet-potato weevil, $30,000; control of deciduous-fruit insects, $45,000; control of citrus-fruit insects, $10,000; control of insects injurious to live stock, $20,000; control of rice insects, $3,000; control of sugar-cane insects, $9,000; general supervision of emergency insect-control work, $3,000; prevention of plant-dust explosions and fires, $75,000; fruit and vegetable utilization, $35,000; in all, $721,300.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hoped it would not be necessary to submit any observations in support of this motion to strike out. As I view the matter, the motion should commend itself to the Senate. I concede that many of the items embraced within the section just read are meritorious and that appropriations may be necessary for investigating the subjects therein referred to, and if this were the regular Agricultural bill I would support each item which my motion attacks. But it must be remembered that only a few weeks since we passed an appropriation bill carrying more than $27,000,000, the greater portion of which amount was to meet the compensation of the experts, employees, and subordinates connected with the Agricultural Department, and who are required to perform substantially the same duties provided for in the pending measure.

The section to which my motion relates calls for more than $700,000. As I read the section, substantially the entire amount is to meet the expenses and salaries of persons now in the employ of the Government or persons who will be employed in the future. There is but little if any benefit to the farmers from this appropriation, unless the benefit flows from the employment by the Government of numerous other individuals.

The provision simply calls for the hiring of additional persons to do the same character of work provided for in the general Agricultural appropriation bill.

To properly expend the $27,000,000 carried by the bill just mentioned will require a multitude of employees. Already there are thousands of persons upon the pay rolls of the Agricultural Department.

This department has expanded in a most extraordinary manner, and it seeks further expansion, at least to the extent of adding many more names to the already enormous list of those for whom the Government must provide employment.

Mr. President, this appropriation bill is a monstrosity; it would not, in my opinion, receive half a dozen votes in this body were it not for the prohibition provision which has been added in the Senate by way of an amendment. It carries millions of dollars, covering the same subjects and providing for the same conditions as are dealt with in the $27,000,000 bill the ink upon which is scarcely dry. Both were drawn by the same bureaus and employees and each seeks to extend the power and authority of those who prepared the bills and to make provisions for a cloud of additional agents, servants, experts, employees, and supernumeraries for whom the patient taxpayers will be compelled to provide. What the farmers need most now is man power on the farm. There are sufficient alleged experts and scientists now in the service of the Agricultural Department. Let those in authority in the various branches and bureaus of the department wisely and economically expend the great sum already appropriated, and they will have performed all that they properly and efficiently can do. To withdraw thousands of additional persons from other activities at this time, when there is a shortage of labor, would be an act of folly and would deserve the sternest condemnation.

As I have indicated, this bill duplicates, in part, provisions of the general Agricultural bill and is therefore unnecessary. I will briefly invite attention to some of the provisions of the general bill recently passed.

Senators will perceive the duplication which we find in the present bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether the appropriations to which he now refers have already been exhausted?

Mr. KING. Certainly not; indeed, as I understand, this huge appropriation has scarcely been touched. As I stated a moment ago, most of this $27,000,000 is to be consumed in paying salaries and expenses of thousands of employees. Now, if we pass the bill under consideration, it means more clerks, more agents, more salaries—the spending of 15 or 20 more millions of dollars in the same fields and along the same lines for which we have made ample provisions.

In passing, the question might be asked where are the thousands of additional employees to come from, if this bill is enacted into law?

Common sense and common honesty would suggest that we employ the $27,000,000 in the most efficient manner, and not seek to exploit the Treasury, as this bill undertakes to do.

It will be a stupendous work, and greatly to the credit of the Agricultural Department, if it will in a proper and scientific way expend the $27,000,000 carried in the regular appropriation bill. Now, let me call attention to some of the items of the appropriation bill which we passed a few days ago:

For the investigation of diseases of orchard and other fruits, $75,935.

The section which I have moved to strike out contains items relating to the same matter.

For conducting such investigations of the nature and means of communication of the disease of citrus trees—

And that is one of the items referred to in this section—

For the investigation of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, including a study of the nature and habits of the parasitic fungi causing the chestnut-tree bark disease, the white-pine blister rust, and other epidemic tree diseases, for the purpose of discovering new methods of control and applying methods of eradication or control already discovered, $83,635.

For applying such methods of eradication or control of the white-pine blister rust as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, including the payment of such expenses and the employment of such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations, or individuals as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, $230,448.

* * * * * * *

For the investigation of diseases of cotton, potatoes, truck crops, forage crops, drug and related plants, $87,800.

One of the items covered by the section to which I have just referred——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Speaking of white-pine blister, was that taken care of by the regular appropriation bill?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir; a large appropriation was made for that purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator does he know whether these items are presented by the Agricultural Department as being necessary for the administration of that department and for the eradication of the diseases of plants, and so forth, or are they presented by some member of the committee who thinks it wise to appropriate for them?

Mr. KING. As I understand, every item here has been presented by some clerk or by some chief or some man who wants to extend his authority in the Agricultural Department. None of them, as I understand, has emanated from any member of the committee. I feel sure that not one dollar carried by this bill was suggested by the committee. This bill is not the handiwork of Senators, but the product of those who would have the spending of the money.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the committee simply take the word of a clerk in the Department of Agriculture as to what appropriations are necessary or does it require the Secretary of Agriculture to make his request?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret to say that, from my knowledge of the proceedings in the Senate and, perhaps, in the other House, we have fallen into the habit of accepting the statement of some subordinate official. No bill, certainly no appropriation bill, can be gotten through this body that does not have the O. K. of the chief of some bureau or of some department or some clerk or employee therein. We care more for the recommendation of some clerk who wants to extend his authority, who wants to blossom out into a bureau chief, or that of some bureau chief who wants to blossom out into the head of a department, than we care for our own judgment or as the result of an independent investigation. A distinguished Senator said a few days since that we were a "rubber stamp."

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, is it not evident that the head of the department, the Secretary of Agriculture, ought to be held responsible at least for recommending all appropriations for his department rather than that the matter should be left to the chiefs of bureaus or to the clerks in the department?

Mr. KING. I agree entirely with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota; but the Senator knows that human nature is human nature wherever you find it. Experience has demonstrated that some thousand-dollar clerk is given a position in one of the departments, and he immediately becomes obsessed with the idea that he is indispensable to the Government. He has a fad or projects some new idea into the service and straightway desires to become a bureau chief, or he makes some recommendation which upon its face seems to be meritorious and points out some line of investigation or some particular activity in which he contends he can render immense service to the Government and to the public. Thereupon, perhaps without proper investigation, but relying upon the recommendation thus made, the chief of the bureau or the head of the department O. K.'s it, and it forms a part of the recommendation made to the committee, or is the basis of the committee's action. Too often bills, and particularly appropriation bills, are the result of the views of men who want to increase their authority; who want to extend their power and aggrandize the positions they occupy.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry take testimony to find out whether or not these items were necessary?

Mr. KING. No; I do not think that any testimony was taken, but I understand the department submitted a statement in support of the items found in this bill. I want to say, however, to my distinguished friend that this bill was drawn, as I remember, before the general Agricultural appropriation bill was passed, so that unquestionably there is a paralleling of subjects in the two appropriation bills.

Let me proceed just a little further with the general appropriation bill, from which I was reading a moment ago. I find an item in the pending measure "for truck and forage crop diseases," and in the general Agricultural appropriation bill there is an appropriation of $87,800 for that purpose. There is also in that bill an appropriation—

For investigating the physiology of crop plants and for testing and breeding varieties thereof, $48,460.

The same subject matter, in general terms, is covered by the bill under consideration. Then there is an appropriation:

For soil-bacteriology and plant-nutrition investigation, * * * $39,300.

Some of the items of this bill under consideration would be construed as authorizing the same investigations as are provided for in the item to which I have just called attention. Then there is another provision in the general appropriation bill:

For soil-fertility investigations, * * * $36,260.

And another appropriation of $107,510—

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops. * * * breeding, and selection.

And so forth.

Then there is another appropriation of $58,820:

For the investigation, testing, and improvement of plants yielding drugs, spices, poisons, oils, and related products and by-products, and for general physiological and fermentation investigations.

The bill under consideration is sufficiently broad to authorize a portion of the appropriation for use in the same direction.

I also find this provision:

For crop technological investigations, including the study of plant-infesting nematodes, $24,940.

Which is obviously covered by provisions in the pending bill. Then:

For biophysical investigations in connection with the various lines of work herein authorized, $32,500.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. There seems to be no immediate prospect of settling this question to-night, and, therefore, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, there is a desire for an executive session. Is that true?

Mr. KING. It will take me some time to discuss this matter.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I understand there is no necessity for an executive session.

RECESS.

Mr. GORE. Then I hope the Senator from California will modify his motion and move that the Senate take a recess until noon to-morrow.

Mr. PHELAN. I modify my motion in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, September 5, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 4, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, lend us Thine aid and help us to conform our thoughts and ways to the highest conceptions of right and duty, as they have been revealed to us in the precepts and example of all the truest and holiest men of the past; that we may be in consonance with Thy will and purposes, and as individuals and a Nation we may, with our allies, straighten out the tangles in which the world finds itself by wicked and designing men.

Continue to uphold and sustain us, with our allies, in the splendid progress toward the end desired; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ESCH. I ask unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. BROWNE], on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague [Mr. BROWNE], on account of illness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 325. A joint resolution amending section 8 of the amendment to the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 325. Joint resolution amending section 8 of the amendment to the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

The Speaker announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4597. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.

PVTS. HENRY JOHNSON AND NEEDHAM ROBERTS.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOULD. I ask to have read the letter of Col. William Hayward, Three hundred and sixty-ninth United States Infantry.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

THREE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-NINTH U. S. INFANTRY,
FORMERLY FIFTEENTH NEW YORK INFANTRY,
SECTEUR POSTAL, No. 54, A. E. F.,
France, May 18, 1918.

Mrs. EDNA JOHNSON,
23 Monroe Street, Albany, N. Y.

MY DEAR MRS. JOHNSON: Your husband, Pvt. Henry Johnson, is in my regiment, the Three hundred and sixty-ninth United States Infantry, formerly Fifteenth New York Infantry. He has been at all times a good soldier and is a good boy, of fine morals and upright character. To these admirable traits he has lately added the most convincing proof of fine courage and splendid fighting ability.

I regret to say that he is at the moment in a hospital, seriously, but not dangerously, wounded, the wounds having been received under such circumstances that everyone of us in the regiment would be pleased and proud to trade places with him. It was as follows:

He and Pvt. Needham Roberts were on guard together at a small outpost of a front-line trench near to the German lines, and during the night a strong raiding party of Germans, numbering from 12 to 20 (judging by the weapons, clothing, and paraphernalia they left behind and by their footprints) stole across No Man's Land and made a surprise attack in the dead of night on our two brave soldiers.

We had learned some time ago from captured German prisoners that the Germans had heard of a regiment of black Americans in this sector, and the German officers had told their men how easy to combat and capture them it would be; so this raiding party came looking for the black Americans. They did not find them asleep, however, but, on the contrary, both Henry Johnson and Needham Roberts were very much awake and alert and attending strictly to their duties. At the beginning of the attack the Germans fired a volley of bullets and grenades, and both the boys were wounded, your husband three times and Roberts twice. Then the Germans rushed the post, expecting to make an easy capture. In spite of their wounds the two boys waited coolly and courageously, and when the Germans were within striking distance opened fire your husband with his rifle and Pvt. Roberts, from his helpless position on the ground, with hand grenades. The German raiding party came on in spite of their wounded, and in a few seconds our boys were at grips with the terrible foe in a desperate hand-to-hand encounter, in which the enemy outnumbered them ten to one.

The boys inflicted great loss on the enemy, but Roberts was overpowered and about to be carried away, when your husband, who had used up all the cartridges in the magazine of his rifle and had knocked one German down with the butt end of it, drew his bolo from his belt. The bolo is a short, heavy weapon carried by the American soldier, with the edge of a razor, the weight of a cleaver, and the point of a butcher knife. He rushed to the rescue of his fallen comrade, and, fighting desperately, split open, with his bolo, the head of the German who was throttling Pvt. Roberts, and turning to the boche who had Roberts by the feet, plunged the bolo into the German's bowels. This one was the leader of the German party, and on receiving what must have been his mortal wound, exclaimed in American English, without any trace of accent, "Oh, the son of a ——— got me"; thus proving that he was undoubtedly one of the so-called German-Americans who came to our country not to become a good citizen of it but to partake of its plenty and bounty and then return to fight for the Kaiser and help enslave the world. He was doubtless selected as the leader of the party to speak English and perhaps fool my soldiers by calling to them in the darkness in English not to fire, that it was a friend.

Henry laid about him right and left with his heavy knife, and Roberts, released from the grasp of the scoundrels, began again throwing hand grenades and exploding them in their midst, and the Germans, doubtless thinking it was a host instead of two brave colored boys fighting like tigers at bay, picked up their dead and wounded and slunk away, leaving many weapons and parts of their torn, cut, and shot-riddled clothing, and leaving a trail of blood which we followed at dawn clear to their lines.

We feel certain that one of the enemy was killed by rifle fire, two by your husband's bolo, one by grenades thrown by Pvt. Roberts, and several other grievously wounded.

So it was in this way the Germans found the black Americans!

Both boys have received the citation of the French general commanding the splendid French division in which my regiment is now serving, and will receive the Croix de Guerre (Cross of War). The citation, translated, is as follows:

——— Division. MAY 16, 1918.

Order No. ———.

The general ——— commanding ——— D. I., mentions in orders of the division the soldiers of the Three hundred and sixty-ninth Regiment d'Infanterie, United States.

1. Johnson, Henry (No. 103348), private in Company C.

Being on double sentry duty during the night, and having been assailed by a group composed of at least a dozen Germans, shot and disabled one of them and grievously wounded two others with his bolo. In spite of three wounds with pistol bullets and grenades at the beginning of the fighting, this man ran to the assistance of his wounded comrade, who was about to be carried away prisoner by the enemy, and continued to fight up to the retreat of the Germans.

He has given a beautiful example of courage and activity.

2. Roberts, Needham (No. 103369), private in Company C.

Being on double sentry duty during the night, having been assailed and grievously wounded in his leg by a group of Germans, continued fighting by throwing grenades, although he was prone on the ground, up to the retreat of the enemy. Good and brave soldier.

The general requested that the citation of the division commander of the soldier, Johnson, be changed to a citation in the orders of the army.

Some time ago the great French general, Gouraud, placed in my hands the sum of 100 francs, to be sent to the family of the first one of my soldiers wounded in a fight with the enemy under heroic circumstances. Inasmuch as these boys were wounded simultaneously and both displayed great heroism, I think it but fair to send to each one half of this sum. Accordingly I am inclosing New York exchange for the equivalent of 50 francs.

I am sure that you have made a splendid contribution to the cause of liberty by giving your husband to your country, and it is my hope and prayer to bring him back to you safe and sound, together with as many of his comrades as it is humanly possible by care and caution to conserve and bring back to America. But it must be borne in mind that we can not all come back; that none of us can come back until this job is done.

My cordial respects go with this letter to the wife of Henry Johnson.

Very truly, yours,

[Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of course it is too late now, I suppose. It is a very delicate matter at best, but I am very sorry that the gentleman from New York saw fit to insert that letter in the RECORD. Not that the exploits there related do not excite our admiration, but, of course, it will be a matter of absolute impossibility to put into the RECORD all of the accounts of these individual acts of heroism. All of us have these letters, and I wish now, at a time when it can not be misunderstood in the future, to say that I shall feel constrained, if I am present in the Hall, to object to the insertion of letters of this character in the RECORD, not because of any lack of appreciation of the heroic qualities displayed by our soldiers but because of the realization that we can not put them all in and that many will not receive that publicity which would be their due.

LIEUT. FRANK BARBER.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the House the story of Frank Barber, a lieutenant in the British Army. Barber is a Yorkshireman, and in August, 1914, like hundreds of thousands of others, he joined the colors of the British Army and fought in France for three years.

In the autumn a year ago our soldiers needed training in all directions, and we sent over to Great Britain for trained officers who could instruct our men. Barber was a first lieutenant in charge of machine guns. He had won great praise for his gallantry and for his skill in machine-gun work. He was assigned by the British Government to come to the United States to train our men. When he came here he was sent to Macon, Ga. That was about a year ago. In February of this year he was instructing the American troops in camp at Macon, and without negligence on his part, as the official court of inquiry disclosed, he was blinded by the explosion of a machine gun. His blindness is total and permanent. Since that time he has been lying at the Walter Reed Hospital, just outside of Washington, and he is now there. There is no hope that he may recover his sight. He is absolutely without private means. His wife and his sister, who happens to be a trained nurse, have come from England and are caring for him at this moment. The Secretary of War, the Surgeon General, and the Judge Advocate General have all recommended that this man be put by the American Congress on the same basis as if he were an American officer, namely, that he be brought under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act. The Senate has passed a bill giving him that status. The House Committee on Military Affairs has unanimously recommended such a bill, which is on the calendar. The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. DENT] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NICHOLLS], who reported the bill, have authorized me to bring up this bill in the House and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It is on the Private Calendar, pretty far down. It may be months before it will otherwise be reached. This man is lying blind and in dire need of the assistance which we can give him. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after he recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I renew the application which I made last evening, and made once before, for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2493) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916. This is a bill that has been pending here in the House for quite a long while. It is up near the head of the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It is Senator KENDRICK's bill. But all Western Senators and Representatives are very much interested in the matter. There are many homestead settlers and people who would be settlers out there affected by it. It is necessary because of a pure oversight, a mere inadvertence in the language of this section of the stock-raising homestead law, whereby an unwarranted hardship is put upon anybody who attempts to avail himself of the provisions of the law by taking an additional homestead not contiguous to his own, and it is to make the law similar in exact terms to the enlarged-homestead law. I may say that not only the department favored it, but I have a letter this morning from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he says they have tentative regulations prepared to be sent out concerning this general law, and that they have apparently been holding them up some time in the hope that the House will approve of this measure so that the public-land settlers, or many of them that are away, can be relieved from this unwarranted hardship, and I hope that there may be no objection to its immediate consideration. The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, September 4, 1918.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: Referring to your inquiry by phone this morning as to Senate 2493, will say that this bill is to extend the 20-mile residence feature now in the enlarged-homestead act, to the grazing-homestead act. Under the existing provisions of the enlarged-homestead act, one who makes an additional entry under the enlarged-homestead act, of noncontiguous land, but within 20 miles of his original entry, may complete the residence requirements as to both entries by continued residence on the original. This bill was reported favorably by the Secretary, and I understand has passed the Senate and is now pending on the House calendar. The department has seen no objection to the legislation. A number of cases are pending where it would seem to be desirable and just, and we have tentative regulations prepared to carry it into effect immediately it becomes a law.

Yours, very truly,

CLAY TALLMAN.

The report upon the bill gives a concise statement of its justice, fairness, and importance, as follows:

Under the stock-raising homestead law, as interperted by the Department of the Interior, it is impossible for a person who has made former entry of lands under the homestead laws to obtain an additional entry of noncontiguous lands of the character described in this measure without establishing a residence thereon, regardless of the fact as to whether or not he has completed proof upon the former entry. The law provides, however, that a person who has made such former entry may file upon additional contiguous lands and complete proof thereon without actual residence upon the additional entry. That is to say, the law draws a distinction as to the method of completing proof on additional entry of contiguous lands as against entry on noncontiguous lands. In the former case residence upon the original entry is accepted in lieu of residence upon the additional land, while in the latter case, though the entryman may have spent years and great effort in establishing his home upon his original filing, he is compelled, if he desires to take advantage of the stock-raising law and is able to secure only noncontiguous lands, to make the same struggle and at the same cost establish a new residence. He is, in other words, obliged to abandon his first residence and set up a new one in order that he may obtain enough additional land to constitute a 640-acre tract, although the theory of the law is specifically that the land is of such a character as to make it necessary for the homesteader to have 640 acres in order to make a living.

This provision seems to be in strict contravention of the plain purpose of the law. Furthermore, it seems to be in conflict with the intention of Congress when it passed the bill. This is indicated by the fact that the law expressly provides that a homestead entryman may take up an additional holding within a radius of 20 miles of his original homestead. If it had been contemplated by Congress to compel the entryman to establish residence upon the additional entry in the same manner as upon original, there would have been no necessity for establishing the 20-mile limitation upon his additional entry, for, under the interpretation of the law, as it now reads, it is of no benefit whatever to the entryman to obtain lands within such limits, and if he is required to establish residence anew, he could as well do it within 100 miles from the original as 20. The 20-mile limitation implies some sort of a compensatory arrangement. This compensation naturally would have been the waiver of residence required upon the additional entry in order to make it possible for entrymen to obtain a 640-acre tract within a 200-mile radius by establishing one residence.

This effect is provided by the first provision of section 3 of the law, which reads as follows:

"Provided, That a former homestead entry of land of the character described in section 2 hereof shall not be a bar to the entry of a tract within a radius of 20 miles from such former entry under the provisions of this act, subject to the requirements of the law as to residence and improvements, which, together with the former entry, shall not exceed 640 acres."

The clause, "subject to the requirements of law as to residence and improvements," is the one which the Interior Department has interpreted as making necessary the establishment of a residence upon the additional entry. The suggested amendment, which is in all respects similar to a provision of the enlarged-homestead act contained in section 7, has the effect of making unnecessary such additional residence in cases where the entryman is still residing upon his original entry. The amendment therefore clearly requires good faith upon the part of the entryman, for if he be not residing upon his original entry he can not, under this provision, secure the additional entry without establishing such residence thereon.

The recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior for the passage of this legislation, as made to Senator H. L. MYERS, is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, October 22, 1917.

Hon. H. L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your request for a report on S. 2493, to amend section 3 of the stock-raising homestead act (39 Stat., 862).

Said section of the act permits an additional entry to be made for a tract within 20 miles of the applicant's "former entry." However, it is stipulated that he shall meet the requirements of law as to residence and improvements. Hence, it is apparent that such additional entry can not be made unless the party has completed the period of residence on his original claim or has done so with the exception of not more than six months, so that he may complete the period before it becomes necessary to begin residence on the additional land. The proposed amendment would relieve such a claimant of the necessity of residence on the additional land, provided he continues to live upon the tract originally entered. It follows that there would be removed the limitation mentioned, as to the conditions on which an additional entry may be made. In the matter of residence, the amended provision would be precisely the same as that found in section 7 of the enlarged-homestead act, added thereto by the act of July 3, 1916 (39 Stat., 344), as applicable in cases where the two tracts in question lie within 20 miles of each other.

The proposed legislation would, as indicated, tend to establish uniformity of law as to these two classes of additional entries. I therefore approve of the measure and recommend that the bill be enacted into law.

Cordially, yours,

ALEXANDER T. VOGELSANG,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I made up my mind on Monday that I should for the present object to any unanimous consents, and for this reason: It has been many weeks since we have had a unanimous-consent day, and there is a long calendar of bills in which a great many Members of the House are interested. We were progressing satisfactorily on Monday with that calendar when one of the leading members of the Democratic organization of the House, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, came in and made the point of no quorum, as far as I could see without any particular reason, and when we all knew that there was not a quorum in the city, so that, of course, that point of no quorum compelled an adjournment and killed the balance of unanimous-consent day. I think we ought to have a unanimous-consent day, and I think on last Monday it ought not to have been cut short. I think all the Members of the House ought to have their bills considered and not occasionally have a favored one come up. Such a case as the gentleman from Massachusetts presents just now I should not have the heart to object to, but there is no such appealing reason for this bill. The trouble is if we take up these occasional bills which gentlemen bring up there will be no pressure on the House or the House organization to allow a unanimous-consent day, which we ought to have. I hope we will have one very soon. For the present I object to the consideration of the bill (S. 2493) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4790) for the relief of Frank Barber.

Mr. GARNER. Had not the gentleman from Massachusetts better make the same objection to this, so that it will serve to force a unanimous-consent day?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Frank Barber, a first lieutenant of the Dorset Regiment of Infantry of the British Army, who lost the sight of both eyes and became totally blind by reason of a premature explosion on February 14, 1918, while acting as an instructor of United States troops at Camp Wheeler, Ga., as compensation for disability resulting therefrom, such sums of money as by the act of Congress approved October 6, 1917, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," is provided to be paid as compensation for disability to an injured person who has lost both eyes or become totally blind from causes occurring in the line of duty in the service of the United States; and such compensation shall be payable and be paid as of and from the 14th day of February, 1918, and under and according to the terms, conditions, and basis of computation in said act provided, and such sum shall be in full of all claims, legal or equitable, of the said Frank Barber, his heirs, representatives, or assigns.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I would like to know whether there will not be an early opportunity to consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, and I would like to suggest Friday night of this week. That would not interfere, and if it would be more convenient we could take some other night when we may consider unobjected to Private Calendar bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that next Friday night there be a session, beginning at 8 o'clock extending not later than half-past 10, for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. Reserving the right to object, why not consider all the bills on the Private Calendar. Of course that allows any Member to make an objection to a bill, and I think it is unfair. I think there ought to be some days or some nights set apart so that all the bills may be considered. I am in favor of considering the Private Calendar, but to say that it may be called and any man in the House who does not know anything about a certain bill can object to it, I do not think it is fair to the membership of the House. I think we ought to have a consideration of all the private bills. We have plenty of time, and I see no reason why certain days should not be set aside for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar and let them all be considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. ROGERS. Would the gentleman from Alabama reserve his request until after this matter is disposed of?

Mr. GARNER. Let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this may be one means of getting a concurrence in the request of the gentleman from Alabama. If you could have Friday night from 8 o'clock until half-past 10 to consider bills on the Private Calendar not objected to, undoubtedly the gentleman's bill would pass that night and a great many other bills like it. That is one reason why his request ought to be acted on, so that it might restrain some one else from objecting.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is hardly wise to inject the consideration of the Private Calendar in here while the revenue bill is under consideration. After that is completed there will be time galore to consider the Private Calendar or any other matters. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he would not prefer the date for considering private bills a week from next Friday, at which time the revenue bill will be nearer its completion as far as consideration in the House goes?

Mr. BURNETT. In reply to the gentleman, I see by the statement in the newspaper that there will be some kind of arrangement by which there will be an adjournment, or an adjournment of three days at a time, and when that is done there will be an exodus from the city and we will not be able to get a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. If there are enough Members who think a recess is more important than to stay here and attend to the calendars, it will not be by unanimous consent when important matters are pending before the House.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be inclined to object unless the gentleman will put it a week from Friday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] a question about this bill, because I am inclined for the present to object. Will this British soldier who came to the United States to perform service here be pensioned by the British Government?

Mr. ROGERS. He will be pensioned at the rate of about 50 pounds a year, and the amount which he will get in the British Government coupled with the amount that he will get if this bill becomes a law will be just a little less than the retirement pay of an officer of his grade in the United States Army.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The fact is, then, that this British soldier who came here assigned by his Government will continue upon the pay roll of the British Government, and would also be placed upon our pension roll.

Mr. ROGERS. He will get about $1,700 a year from both sources, as I understand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether the British Government——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will not consent to further discussion, I shall be forced to object.

Mr. FERRIS. I will not. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for the present I object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill (S. 1419).

The question was taken.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 0.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, we have reached now the most important section in this bill, and the one about which most of the contest will circle. I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment. More than 100 Members are present, a quorum of the committee. A number of them did not stand up to be counted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighteen Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 250, nays 0, not voting 180, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, while there is a large number more than a quorum present, I want to appeal to every Member of the House to stay here during the sittings of the Committee of the Whole House and keep a quorum present. This is a very important bill, no one can question that, and remember that this bill is equal in its importance to any two bills that have ever yet been before the House because it embraces all jurisdictions, whereas bills heretofore have been confined either to navigable streams or to the public lands. Therefore it takes a longer time for its consideration. Now, if this bill is not passed by next Friday, it will not be passed at all in all probability, and I do not blame the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] on insisting that a quorum should remain here, and if gentlemen will not stay here and this bill fails we will know who are responsible for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to consult the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. I propose, in pursuance to the agreement already made, to consider the amendment which I offered to strike out the net-investment definition, and further amendments following that provided it is stricken out to the tenth section, and the amendment offered to the fourteenth section by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], or any other that may be offered as far as that section is concerned, and then the consideration of the substitute, notice of which has been given as an amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if we can not come to some agreement concerning the matter of time that will be consumed in the discussion of this subject in considering the three amendments, the gentleman from Wisconsin to control one half and myself the other half so as far as possible to expedite the consideration of the bill, for I believe that when the amendments touching this question, which now seems to be so vital, whether it is to be net investment or fair value not exceeding actual cost, are over I think we can have reasonably expeditious consideration of the rest of the bill. Therefore I think we ought as far as possible to thrash out everything bearing on these propositions and not rediscuss them after we pass section 14. What does the gentleman think will be a reasonable time?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the net-investment item was passed over with a motion pending by the gentleman from Tennessee to strike out.

Mr. SIMS. To strike out the definition.

Mr. ESCH. And subsections (c) and (d) of section 10 were passed over, and there is now pending a motion to substitute for sections 14 and 15, with an amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan to amend section 14?

Mr. SIMS. And also the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan to section 14.

Mr. ESCH. I just stated that.

Mr. SIMS. That, of course, would have to be acted upon before the motion to substitute.

Mr. ESCH. And the gentleman's amendment to strike out the so-called Parker amendment or the——

Mr. SIMS. That is correct.

Mr. ESCH. I understand when the time for general debate on this subject matter is over we will take up these several sections and subsections for amendment.

Mr. SIMS. And consider all amendments which have been offered and vote on them in the order in which they have been offered.

Mr. ESCH. They would have to be discussed during the period of general debate?

Mr. SIMS. Any amendment proposed to be offered to any of them which has not already been offered shall also be discussed.

Mr. ESCH. No new amendment would be offered at the expiration of general debate?

Mr. SIMS. They may be offered but not debated if the amendment is not offered during debate; that is, a gentleman during this general debate can give notice of an amendment he expects to offer and discuss during general debate, and then when the time comes to vote on it after the time, there is to be no further discussion on that or any other amendment that might at that time be offered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What does the gentleman mean by general debate? I understood that we had concluded general debate on this bill.

Mr. SIMS. We have, and this general debate is to be devoted entirely to these amendments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think we can make better progress by taking up this bill in the regular way as bills are always considered, and take one section at a time and dispose of it instead of having a general agreement——

Mr. SIMS. I have conferred with members of the committee on both sides, and it is the concensus of opinion that we will get along better in this way——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am simply seeking to facilitate its passage.

Mr. SIMS. I know the gentleman has no other purpose.

Mr. ESCH. I think we would like to have an hour and a half on this side.

Mr. SIMS. Can not the gentleman get along with one hour—one hour on that side and one hour on this?

Mr. ESCH. I have more requests than one hour and a half, and I am curbing those who seek time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have every reason to believe the gentleman from Wisconsin is very anxious to get through——

Mr. ESCH. I certainly am. I did not use a minute's time in general debate.

Mr. SIMS. And I believe that will really be the best plan to adopt, and I agree to it and therefore——

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOREMUS. If the amendment which I have offered reserving the power in the Government to retake the property at any time during the license period upon paying the net investment therein should fail, I desire to offer an amendment at some time during the proceedings providing for the development of all this water power by the Federal Government, the States, and the municipalities.

I wish to ask the Chair whether it would be in order for me to offer that amendment while we are considering section 14 or whether I should wait until after the balance of the bill has been disposed of?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion at that point?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Whether the fair-value plan or the net-investment plan prevails, that does not involve your question. In other words, your amendment would be just as pertinent to one as to the other, would it not?

Mr. DOREMUS. I think so.

Mr. FERRIS. Your thought is that the Federal Government ought to reserve to itself the right to take over the property at any time even before the expiration of the term, and that amendment would be just as pertinent whatever view prevails on the others.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield? I have an amendment designed to accomplish the same purpose as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan——

Mr. FERRIS. Why not set apart a little time to debate that? It is an important matter.

Mr. DOREMUS. The amendment I may desire to offer is not directly connected with the proposition at issue now. I would like to have 10 or 15 minutes on that.

Mr. SIMS. There would be no objection to that.

Mr. DOREMUS. I have not an answer to my question. All I am interested in knowing, Mr. Chairman, is if I can offer this amendment, in case I decide to do so, providing for the development of water power through the Federal Government, the States, and municipalities, at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill by the committee? I would like to know whether that would be a proper place to introduce it.

The CHAIRMAN. That depends very largely on the nature of the unanimous-consent request that is made and agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Before the Chair passes on that proposition, I want to reserve the right to make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. ESCH. I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan would be either to section 14 as we have it in the bill or to section 14 as proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. DOREMUS. The amendment I have prepared and which I desire to offer in the event the amendment now pending shall be voted down strikes out all of the bill after section 2 and substitutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That would not be included in this agreement.

Mr. DOREMUS. I would not want my right to present that particular proposition shut off by any arrangement that may be made now.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman could offer that amendment after the first section is read.

Mr. DOREMUS. I may not offer it at all.

Mr. WALSH. It would not be in order unless unanimous consent was given to offer it. It would be considered as an original bill.

Mr. SIMS. So far as amendments are concerned only. We can take that up after we get through with this. There is no disposition on my part to make points of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would not the gentleman be willing to make his unanimous-consent request that there be three hours' general debate upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and his amendment striking out the net investment?

Mr. SIMS. And the others?

Mr. ANDERSON. The others are dependent upon that, of course.

Mr. FERRIS. The chairman has an amendment to strike out the definition.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is what I refer to. These amendments could be considered in the usual course. We will not save any time by putting these things all in together anyway.

Mr. SIMS. We will know more about it after the vote on the real question.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we have three hours of discussion in general debate on the amendments set out and mentioned, the amendment I offered to strike out the definition of net investment, the amendment which has been offered to section 10. In other words, amendments that may be offered to section 10 regarding the net investment, and also the amendment which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and I understand as the Judge Parker amendment, which was reserved, and also the amendment offered to section 14 by Mr. DOREMUS and the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] to strike out sections 14 and 15.

Mr FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not intend to object, but only to make a suggestion to the chairman. Why does not the chairman ask unanimous consent to devote three hours of debate to the net-investment question and all questions bearing on that particular point, and then set apart a time to debate the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], who is interested in whether or not the Government should step in?

Mr. SIMS. I am trying to confine it to these other amendments, and then, as the gentleman from Minnesota suggested, we will make an agreement as to the others.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to make a suggestion here which, I think, is pertinent. I do not desire to take much time. If the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] striking out section 14 and substituting his amendment is adopted, and also if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] striking out the net investment is adopted, there will have to be some readjustment of section 10 and perhaps of other portions of the bill. And I think it would not be wise to limit the debate in such a way that there could be no discussion whatever on the readjustment which ought to be made in section 11. I would like very much if the request now could be limited to the two amendments, that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], leaving the rest of the matter open for such readjustment as will be necessary touching the adoption of those amendments, if they are adopted. Those two amendments will stand or fall together.

Mr. SIMS. That is, that we should vote on amendments to section 10 after we have voted on the amendment and substitute?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I have no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I reserve the right to object, just for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Tennessee if he has disposed of all his hour and a half?

Mr. SIMS. I expect, as a matter of course, the members of the committee to use it if they ask for it.

Mr. FOSTER. You can not do that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I expect the members of the committee have some observations that they would like to give the House the benefit of.

Mr. SIMS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not know.

Mr. DOREMUS. Be as reasonable as possible.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not want more than 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. The time ought not to be confined entirely to the committee.

Mr. SIMS. I did not intend to confine it to the committee. I said that I expected to give preference to members of the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is confining it to the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not fair. It should not be confined to the committee.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think there is any question but that the gentleman will have his time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I believe that three hours is too short a time to debate this subject, in view of the debate that occurred on the other side. This is the matter, as I understand, concerning which there is the greatest conflict among the members of the committee and among the men who have written to us, whose letters appear in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMS. Tell us what you want done, without commenting on it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. My idea is that the committee is going to want more than one hour and a half and the rest of us are likely to be left out. I would like to have a little time.

Mr. SIMS. I am very anxious for you to have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will please restate his request.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Why not make it 5 o'clock, then?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, then you might just as well throw the day away. There will not be anybody here. There will not be a quorum.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. There will be only the speakers here if you limit it to three hours.

Mr. WALSH. The general debate on this measure, during which time the net-investment matter was discussed in a general way, occurred several weeks ago. Now, the debate on the sections as they have been read—the debate touching on net investment and recapture—has only been casual, and I suggest to the gentleman, in view of the fact that this is the more important part of the bill, that an hour and a half is rather a short time to devote to it. I have no desire to prolong or delay the proceedings, but it seems to me if each side took two hours and then discussed all these amendments that are pending and at that time the committee should vote on them and have no more debate on any amendments that might subsequently be offered, you would make better progress.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] hit the nail on the head when he said that if we were to have a long-drawn debate the only way would be to have a larger attendance here than the speakers. For my part, I would rather have a few gingery minutes and have a corporal's guard here to hear me than to drag along for an hour with empty benches.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but this is a matter of great importance, and the debate is going to settle which scheme will be kept in the bill or inserted in the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. The debate will be full even if there is nobody here to hear it.

Mr. WALSH. I will be glad to give the gentleman from Tennessee any assistance I can. I will be glad to.

Mr. SIMS. Will not the gentleman let this agreement go through, and then at the end of the time, if gentlemen who have really some interest in the bill wish to speak and not merely kill time, if there is any genuine demand for further debate on these particular amendments, I would not object to continuing it to cover the time the gentleman has mentioned? But let us not have over three hours to start with.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have witnessed agreements of this kind when all the time was taken up by members of the committee, and when Members not on the committee had no opportunity to express themselves. I do not know whether that will be true in this case or not. Possibly it might be obviated by ascertaining in advance who wished to speak. Another gentleman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], stated a moment ago that perhaps an hour and a half would be sufficient for that side. I do not know what the gentleman means by "that side." This is not a partisan question. I expect to vote on the investment clause as it stands in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. I call attention to the fact that the committee is equally divided as to parties so far as its membership goes.

Mr. SMALL. I would like to have some opportunity to give my reasons for my vote.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman knows I want to be fair. I have no idea of keeping the gentleman out, but I can not say now to what extent I will yield.

Mr. ESCH. I will be willing to promise the gentleman five minutes of my time, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Tennessee will give the gentleman some of his.

Mr. SIMS. The time I am reserving here is to be used in behalf of the amendments that may be offered, and the time on the other side is to be consumed by those who are opposed to those amendments. This committee, as I said, is equally divided between the parties. There is no partisanship about this. If we do not agree on time soon we have lost half an hour already.

Mr. SMALL. I would like to have some understanding. I have had experience in being cut out from time by a little modesty in yielding to these requests, and I do not want the debate to be closed until I have opportunity to address the committee.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin has guaranteed the gentleman a little opportunity.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Tennessee was silent.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman is going to oppose these amendments he ought not to ask me to yield him time. There is no politics in it. The committee, as I said, is equally divided.

Mr. SMALL. Suspecting that, I suggested to the committee that this was not a partisan question, and I wanted to know where I stood. The unanimous-consent request of the gentleman does not say whether the time is to be controlled equally by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the gentleman from Tennessee, or whether it depends on the recognition of the Chair.

Mr. SIMS. That has been stated as part of the agreement. He is to have one-half and I the other.

Mr. SMALL. I should like to have some understanding that I can have at least 15 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I can not guarantee to any particular man the time he is to have, even members of the committee.

Mr. ESCH. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee submit his request?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desired 15 minutes, but the gentleman from Wisconsin has kindly suggested that he will yield me 10 minutes. Hoping that 5 minutes more will be yielded graciously by the gentleman from Tennessee, I shall not object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I would like to have presented and read now, so that I may discuss it.

Mr. SIMS. You can have it read later.

Mr. RAKER. I want to have it read before the debate starts.

Mr. SIMS. Well, let it be read. Anything on earth, if it is reasonable, to get started.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that we have general debate for three hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], he to yield time to whomsoever he desires, and I to control the other half and yield it in behalf of those who are in favor of the amendment, and the debate, while general, will be confined to the subject matter of the sections that are being amended.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman exclude from the three hours the time that will be taken in getting a quorum?

Mr. SIMS. No; three hours' debate means debate. It does not mean time taken in getting a quorum. I am not asking for a vote at a particular hour by the clock.

Mr. CANNON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent preferred by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Now, with the consent of the gentleman from Tenenssee, I ask that my amendment be read for information.

Mr. WALSH. Is it to be considered as pending?

Mr. RAKER. As pending; that is all.

Mr. WALSH. Then the gentleman offers this?

Mr. RAKER. I offer it to be considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Strike out the words "net investment" and insert in lieu thereof the words "fair value not to exceed actual cost," in line 3, page 41. Strike out the words "net investment" and insert in lieu thereof "value of such property," in line 4, page 42. Strike out the words "net investment" and insert in lieu thereof the words "fair value," in line 11, page 42, all of section 14. Strike out sub (d), section 10, being all of lines 20 to 25 of page 36, and all of lines 1 to 9, page 37. Strike out all of lines 1 to 18, both inclusive, page 27, of section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California has been read for the information of the committee, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question before he begins?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How does the gentleman's amendment correspond with the suggestion of the President in his letter?

Mr. FERRIS. The amendments are in absolute conformity with the suggestion of the President. He asks us to put the bill in that shape.

Mr. Chairman, on December 24 last the Senate passed the Shields bill, and it came to this body for attention. It was referred to the special Water Power Committee, and a complete substitute was reported by them on June 28, 1918. Every line of the Shields bill was stricken out, and this substitute now before you was reported into this House.

Section 14 of this bill is what is known as the recapture clause. In a word, it lays down the measurement of damages that the Government is to pay in order to recover its property at the end of the license period.

The Committee on Water Power struck out the original section 14 as it came over in the original bill and incorporated in its stead a new provision known as the net-investment recapture plan. It is to that section and to that substitute that I desire to direct your attention.

There are four main, salient, outstanding principles in any water-power bill. There are other minor ones, of course, but the ones that stand out above the rest are these:

First, what shall be the life of the license? Shall it be for a term or shall it be in perpetuity?

We have succeeded in keeping this bill down where it provides for a term and keeps the ultimate ownership in the Federal Government, and that is as it ought to be, a complete victory for the people, and a complete overthrow of the desires of the water-power developers on that proposition.

The second proposition is, Shall the Federal Government give away the water power, deriving nothing in return for it, or shall we charge a reasonable rental or royalty? The people have prevailed in that instance, and we provide for the payment of a royalty, eliminating the maximum royalty, so that the department can secure all that the water power is really worth.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not now. I want to go ahead.

The next proposition that is outstanding more prominent than the rest is, I think, Shall the Federal Government reserve the right to protect, to regulate, and control water power? In that, I believe, the public interest has been served, because the Federal Government has absolute power to regulate and control water power under this bill; so I think we have succeeded fairly well in that regard.

The fourth outstanding provision is the recapture clause, the ability to get it back, to recoup and recover our own property after the license has expired. And let me pause long enough to say that the one thing that determines whether or not it is a license or a grant is our ability to get it back. If we write across the head of the bill that this is a license for a term, but make it impossible to recover it, we have just as effectually granted it away as though we made a grant in absolute fee simple, and it is on that point that I think the Committee on Water Power have signally failed. Now, I will go right at that proposition.

The outstanding, prominent, salient features of a water-power policy are not new in this House. They are old. We have had the subject up here so often that it is scarcely necessary to refer to it. Each time, without a single exception, the public-interest side has prevailed, and the selfishness of the water-power interests has been swept aside.

Let me recall for a moment just what has been done on that proposition.

On August 24, 1914, we passed through the House here the first water-power bill, and it contained a provision to pay the fair value of the property when the license had ended, and no more. And it went further. It provides that the property that is not subject to deterioration, such as land, water rights, rights of way, shall come back to the people at the end of the term at exactly what the water-power people paid for it. There was no serious controversy about that. Amendments were offered, sought to be adopted, and were swept away in defeat, and the House by an almost unanimous vote voted to preserve the correct principle, and they did preserve it. There was no division along this center line of the House. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN, the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT, and other prominent Republicans, helped get the bill into proper shape and helped to keep it in proper shape. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSTER, the gentleman from California, Mr. KENT, the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. HUMPHREYS all stood square for the public interests, so that 50 years of growth might not be set up against the people and cause them to bear the brunt of it at the end of the term.

That same thing happened January 8, 1916, when another bill passed carrying the same provision. That same thing happened again August 4, 1914, in a bill that came from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They brought in a bill with another principle in it. They came in and advocated it strenuously that there should be no charge for water power. They advocated that water power ought to be granted in perpetuity, and that there was nothing to this license plan. The House will not be troubled very much in recollecting as to what happened to that contention; it was voted down almost unanimously. It was snowed under. It was defeated. The House would not stand for it.

The same thing happened again July 14, 1916, when another bill came down from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and this House again said you shall not write into the law any proposal to give away the water power in perpetuity; you shall not write into the water-power bill a proposal to let it go without a royalty; you shall not write into a water-power bill that it shall go without full Government regulation; you shall not write a water-power bill that does not contain a proper recapture clause so that we can get the water power back again after the license has expired.

Now, let us see what has happened on this occasion. Let us see what this committee is seeking to do. This Committee on Water Power, made up of the remnants of three committees, put this in the bill. It is the condition precedent to a retaking in section 14, and I will not read the entire section, but only the part that is pertinent:

Upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the net investment of the licensee in the project or projects taken, plus such reasonable damages, if any, to property of the licensee valuable, serviceable, and dependent as above set forth but not taken as may be caused by the severance therefrom of property taken, and shall assume all contracts entered into by the licensee with the approval of the commission.

Now, gentlemen of the House, that provision and that language in section 14 is brought into the House by the Water Power Committee, and it says this and nothing more: That the Federal Government shall first let these water-power people have the water-power sites, which are natural monopolies, for a term of 50 years, and that as a condition precedent to their taking them back at the end of 50 years they must pay what? They must pay the net investment, which means to pay back every penny the water-power people put into it. All previous provisions that we have heretofore had, and which the House has always agreed to, have been that we would pay back the fair value of the property, which in no instance should exceed the actual cost. This is the correct principle if we are to preserve the public interest. This is what should be done to-day.

Why change? Why pay at the end of 50 years for something that we do not get? Why pay at the end of 50 years to the water-power companies that have made a profit and dividends untold, why pay back to them for antiquated and obsolete machinery what they paid at the start? What appropriation committee would be willing to do any such thing? What State, what county, what municipality would pay for something that they did not get? It is all wrong. It should not prevail. I only hope I can make it clear.

I undertake to say that this Congress is going very far afield when they make the Federal Government an absolute insurer that the water-power people will get back every cent they invest in any water-power project or any other project. The New York bankers and bond brokers came before us and told us that this was a better bill than the Shields bill. I do not know about that. The Shields bill has nothing in it to make the Federal Government an insurer of every dollar invested in the property. So I suppose from a water-power developer's standpoint it is a better bill and correspondingly a worse one for the public.

I never have heard of such a proposition as this one. Let me follow the practical side of this and see if I can not give the House an example of what they are about to do. Fifty years is a long time to grant a water power, anyway, but we have agreed on that term——

Mr. DOREMUS. Some of us.

Mr. SIMS. Not exceeding 50 years.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; that is the maximum; and they can make it any number of years less. The present law as it now stands is revocable, a permit law. The Interior Department can revoke and has revoked, the Agricultural Department can revoke and has revoked, without payment, certain water-power franchises that they have heretofore issued.

So we have now what? Nothing but a revocable-permit law. It is now a 1-day-permit law, and by this bill we are changing that from a 1-day law to a 50-year law, if we agree to the 50-year provision, and we have already done so in this bill. And on top of that they want us to agree to buy back the property at the end of the term, not at its fair value, but to pay them back what they paid for it! This bill is a substitute for the Shields bill, and we ought to pass a better bill than the Shields bill, not a worse one. We ought to pass a bill through this House that is even leaning backward as a rigid proposition in order to get a good bill out of conference, and those who have served on conference committees of this House know the necessity for what I say. The investment bankers are anxious to have this put through. One bond broker was invited down here to testify. He insists this is a better bill for the investor or for the developer than the Shields bill, and all the water-power people are busy and anxious to get this bill through. Why? Because it makes the Government an insurer and enables a man without a cent of money of his own to get a franchise from this commission and then can go down to New York and borrow the full amount for the development, because he can point out that section 14 makes the Government an absolute insurer of every cent that is put into the property. If we are going to do this we ought to adopt the plan of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], and I would infinitely rather do that, and let the Government absolutely put up the money and develop these natural monopolies itself, although I do not advocate that, because I doubt if we could get the money to build or the power to get it through.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is there any provision in this bill whereby the Government might get any water site back before the end of the license?

Mr. FERRIS. We have forfeiture provisions for breaches of the contract, but otherwise not. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] is going to offer an amendment to do that thing. He and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] are both going to advocate the writing into the bill of a provision to let the Government take it over for a term, even though there be no breach.

Mr. GOOD. I did not understand this bill had a provision that required the Government to buy back these properties, but that it only gave the Government permission to buy them back.

Mr. FERRIS. I am very glad the gentleman has asked that. True, that is so, but the other alternative is exactly what the water-power people want—to let the license go on forever. [Applause.] That is the whole trouble here. They want it fixed so we can never get it back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman from Tennessee indulge me for a few minutes longer?

Mr. SIMS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FERRIS. Ten minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. What is the relation of the emergency water-power bill, which I understand the President has recently recommended, to this bill?

Mr. FERRIS. That will cause me to digress for a word or two, but I shall be glad to do so. The emergency is this: The estimate of the Government engineers in the United States is that we have from 60,000,000 to 200,000,000 potential horsepower of hydroelectric energy, and the Congress has fought and quarreled over provisions and the water-power people have been trying to get more than they were entitled to, as I believe, all these years, to such an extent that we have not developed the water power beyond 6,000,000 of horsepower, and 6,000,000 out of 60,000,000 is a very small percentage to be developed. There ought to be more developed, so that we could save our coal.

Mr. LONDON. So that this legislation will not meet the emergency.

Mr. FERRIS. It will be a great conservator of coal and fuel, for water power, unlike anything else, does not consume anything in the using.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the gentleman not think, to be plain about this matter, that this bill is purely a socialistic bill?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, of course I think this is a good bill.

Mr. THOMAS. But the gentleman does not answer my question. Does he not think that it is a socialistic bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I trust that my friend from Kentucky will not lead me off, as I have only a few minutes. I am not able to pass on what is socialistic and what is not. My own opinion is that this is a great constructive measure, and if we do not write a provision into the bill that destroys it we will get good legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the gentleman not think that the best thing to do is to defeat it?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not. I have tried here for years, and I want to try a little longer to help get this bill through. We ought to develop the water power, and it seems to me almost criminal to let fifty or sixty million horsepower hydroelectric energy run idly to the sea, doing no one any good, while we are burning up our coal and fuel. [Applause.] Water power, unlike anything else, uses nothing in the using.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I wish the gentleman would not interrupt me now and will permit me to proceed.

Mr. SMALL. Before the gentleman concludes may I ask him a brief question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes, indeed. Four times the House has passed upon this, with the correct principle each time. If there ever was a case of res adjudicata, this is one of them. Let me read what the different people have said upon the subject. Secretary Lane said, in answer to a question by Mr. Cantor, of New York:

> The 50-year period and the fact that we must have the right of way and other realty that is bought by the projectors themselves at the price that was paid for it, at its cost to them—those seemed to me to be the two fundamental elements of the measure. And the latter proposition I have taken as an offset to the first proposition which I had in mind, namely, that the dam itself should come to the Government. We set that aside and accept in lieu thereof the proposition that we shall pay these people the cost to them of the property that they are compelled to buy.

Let me read what Mr. Walter L. Fisher, ex-Secretary of the Interior, said in response to a question upon the recapture clause. He says:

> You have taken care of that matter if you provide for the payment on appraisal of the property or payment of a fair value if the lease is not renewed.

Here is what Mr. Pinchot says. There are many people who dislike Mr. Pinchot, who say that he tips over backward on the proposition. Perhaps he does, and perhaps he does not. To my own mind he does not. He is speaking of section 5 of the recapture clause:

> There is a provision in section 5 which, it seems to me, is of the utmost value and importance, and that is that which requires the taking over of the property at actual cost of rights of way, water rights, lands and interests. That is, it prevents the company from charging unearned increment in property of that sort against the public.

Nothing in that that says the Government must pay back every cent they put in. On the contrary, this says he believes that we ought to save something for the consumer. Who uses this water power? Men, women, and children. What for? To light their homes, their streets; to run their automobiles; to run their tractors, their fans; and to cook by. The waterpower people want too much when they want to jump from a 1-day license to a 50-year license and, on top of that, ask the Federal Government to become the insurer that will pay back every cent they put in. Let me give the House an example, if I may. Suppose the water-power people get a license, and they will, for 50 years. Suppose they use it for 50 years, as they will. Suppose they make enormous profits out of it, as many of them will. Suppose at the expiration of the 50-year period it would only cost one-half of the original cost to build a new plant—at the end of the term. What Congress or what constituency would say it was honest or fair to pay back to them the total amount they paid for it 50 years previous? The answer would be, the Appropriations Committee would say, "The Congress that wrote into the law any such a provision as that was not absolutely square with their own conscience or with the people who are to use the water power." [Applause.] Let us see again what happened. Suppose the water-power plant has a speculative scheme and never became a going concern at all. Then, in that event, to get rid of it, and get them out of the stream, you would have to pay back every cent of this net investment. To me such a proposal is absolutely preposterous. Let us see who appeared for this. We had some hearings up there and I make no castigation of anybody who appeared. I have not the list, but it appears in the hearings. We had 50 or 60 people who appeared, who sat there through the hearing, water-power developers, bond brokers, men who knew exactly what they wanted. Now, I cast no reflection upon them. They had the right to appear there as other citizens; it was perfectly proper, and I am not scolding or complaining about them. What I do say is they knew what they wanted, and in this net-investment plan they got what they wanted. If it can not be shown here to-day, it will be shown and known later—this thing is not square.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman permit a question now?

Mr. FERRIS. I was not quite through with some other statements, if the gentleman will wait a minute or two more. Dr. George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey, who has been director for a good many years—let us have his opinion on this proposition of recapture. He does not think it is necessary to write into the law that the Federal Government should pay back what they paid in. [Applause.]

> I believe with you on the question of whether fair values should be substituted for actual cost; I believe the question comes right down, as the chairman suggested, to whether the stockholders of a power development company who have been running for 50 years shall secure the benefit of that increase in land value, or whether the community at large should secure it.

To my mind I just a little bit prefer the community ought to secure some of the benefits created by 50 years in a nondeteriorating property; that the property should be paid for at what it is worth and no more. [Applause.] There can not be anything unfair about that. He goes on to say:

> I believe that the tendency, the tendency of public opinion at the present time, is toward the latter, to let the community reap the benefits in that in the creation of which they have been so large a factor. I think in any legislation at this time we should face forward and not backward.

Why, we used to give water-power sites away at $1.25 an acre. The water-power interests got hold of them and practiced extortion on the people. The gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Illinois were watchdogs who sat around here; with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], they used to sit around here and object to these bills before any of the rest of us knew what was going on. Now that we know it, shall we write into the law something that will absolutely, under the guise of fairness, give away that which we can never get back, the water power of this country? He further states:

> So that it means simply that we will give an opportunity for the citizens of 50 years hence to decide whether they will take over the plant at what I believe will be a fair value if they pay simply the actual cost on the lands; and it will not be only equitable, but it will not be prohibitive, as I suggested a while ago; it might be if it were put on the basis of what its fair value was at that particular time.

But we do not do that. Now, I have here also the report of the Agricultural Department of what they thought on the proposition two or three years ago, and this is what they say. Mr. Merrill appeared for the Agricultural Department. Now, he has appeared later, and those gentlemen who will present his views, and they will be out of accord with this, but I present his views when this proposition was up a couple of years ago:

> My remedy for that situation is exactly the remedy proposed here in the bill, that they shall be forbidden, as far as any public land is concerned, to capitalize its value for rate making, or for any other purposes; that the time of the recapture, when it comes at the termination of the lease or under other conditions and earlier, that such property shall go in at its actual cost and not at its inflated valuation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman yield now for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not the time. If I had——

Mr. SMALL. Will not the gentleman ask for a minute or a half a minute?

Mr. FERRIS. I ask for a half a minute to answer, if I can, the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has spoken with pride about two bills known as the Ferris water-power bills, one of which passed in 1914 and the other passed the House on January 8, 1916; both were reported from the committee of which the gentleman was chairman.

Mr. FERRIS. That is correct.

Mr. SMALL. I wish to ask the gentleman if he approves the recapture clause in the 1916 bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I do. I approve of both of them. I approve of the recapture clause. Although they are different in verbiage, in actuality they are not different. They both passed without a roll call. Everybody was for them. There was no controversy about them. There are many other things I would like to present, but I have spoken before on the subject. My views are well known. I have no interest only to do the right thing.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCARTHUR. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

Mr. FERRIS. The time is fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed uninterrupted by interrogatories, in the first part, at least.

The whole controversy here arises because of the change of basis of recapture from the basis that has been used heretofore in various bills reported to the House. In this bill the committee has recommended net investment as against fair value, not to exceed actual cost. I want to use a few minutes to show the parentage of this new basis of recapture.

There was created in the Departments of Agriculture, War, and Interior an interdepartmental committee, consisting of Mr. Merrill, of the Treasury Department; Mr. Finney and Mr. Brown, of the Interior Department; and Gen. Black, Chief Engineer of the Army. Those officials were asked to make a draft of a water-power bill along lines suggested by the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture. They made such draft. It was submitted to the three Secretaries just before the holiday recess, and by them it was submitted to the President. They adopted the draft of the interdepartmental committee, but the interdepartmental committee realized that it had not fully completed certain phases of the bill, and so even after the draft was sent to the President this committee continued its studies, and submitted amendments to the three Secretaries, who indorsed them, and on the 27th day of February sent to Chairman SIMS a letter asking consideration for these amendments. Among these was the amendment as to the net investment. That amendment if adopted necessitated other modifications in sections 14 and 15 of the bill. The fact is that the net investment definition did not originate with Mr. Merrill. It originated with the Interdepartmental Committee and after conference with the three Secretaries. It was taken up by Secretary Lane. He suggested to the Interdepartmental Committee that they confer with Mr. Aitchison, of the Interstate Commission, he being an expert on valuation matters. This they did, and it was Commissioner Aitchison, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who suggested that for purposes of defining "cost" they make reference to the classification for investment in road and equipment as used by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its valuation work. This was done. It received the approval of the three Secretaries, and I wish to say that those three Secretaries did not grant their approval without due consideration. Mr. Merrill conferred with Mr. Houston in every phase and feature of these amendments, including net investment.

Messrs. Merrill, Finney, and Brown, of the Department of the Interior, conferred with Secretary Lane, and Gen. Black conferred with the War Department. This proposed amendment was one whole week in the Department of War before it received the signature of the Secretary of War. It had repeated consideration on the part of the three Secretaries, and they finally recommended it to this committee and we adopted it.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] in his speech the other day said that the water-power people, the syndicates, the bond brokers, have been repeatedly asking Congress certain things. They were defeated as to the length of tenure, they were defeated as to the imposition of a charge or royalty, but, he said, when it came to the recapture clause these people got what they wanted. If they got what they wanted then he accuses such men as Secretary Houston, Secretary Lane, and the Secretary of War of giving to these water-power syndicates what they wanted. I have such high regard for these three Secretaries and such respect for their intelligence and knowledge of the subject matter that I take their word and I accept their recommendations. Will any man here impugn the honesty and the courage and the wisdom of Secretary Lane when it comes to a proposition of net investment or valuation? Why, Secretary Lane was for years chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was Secretary Lane who wrote that famous decision in the intermountain cases. It was Secretary Lane who said to the Burlington road, "You shall not have your valuation for rate making except it be reduced by $150,000,000 below the amount you claim." Lane is the man that supports this proposition. [Applause.] I am tired of these imputations made by gentlemen on this floor against these capable and efficient officers of the Government and members of the President's Cabinet. And Aitchison, who suggested this proposition of net investment, who is he? He is one of the best experts in the United States on the question of valuation. He made his reputation before President Wilson appointed him on the Interstate Commerce Commission. He was the one that suggested this proposition of using the classification of investment in road and equipment to define and determine original cost.

Have you read Secretary Houston's testimony of the hearings? If you have, you can not help but see that he had a full, comprehensive grasp of the subject of valuation and the subject of net investment. In his testimony he says that net investment as a basis for recapture is the best yet devised in any measure that has been presented to Congress. [Applause.] I put up the deliberate judgment of these three Secretaries and Mr. Aitchison, all men who are expert in the matter of valuation, against some of the arguments that have been presented on the floor of this House. Gentlemen, these men would not be guilty of putting a joker in a bill, for they have their reputations to maintain. And some of this newspaper propaganda that has been sent around during the last week is not anything else than an imputation on the honesty and integrity and wisdom of these Cabinet officers.

And now comes the President, who sends a letter to us and says we should accept the principle of recapture that has four times met the ratification of the House. The President no doubt had only an ex parte hearing on the proposition. He is too busy a man to have studied the complicated question of net investment. He heard only one side, and we know the gentlemen who sought to present their viewpoints to the President. I do not question the President's attitude. He has the right to assume the position he has taken. But this bill, gentlemen, is not a war measure. It is a measure of peace. I concede to the President all his prestige and power as Commander in Chief when it comes to a question of war, but this is one not of war but of peace. And I trust there is sufficient individuality left in the membership of this House so that it can discern the merits of a proposition when fairly and fully presented.

What does this net investment do? What does it mean? In the first place, in order to determine what we mean by "the actual, original, legitimate cost," we refer to the classification of investment for road and equipment adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1914. Now, we have a basis. We have something that is already in force, something that is already being applied in the valuation of our railroads at this very day. Did you see the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission the other day in the Texas Midland case? That decision discussed various phases of valuation based upon the classification we have made a part of this bill.

Now, if we have got the classification, if we have got the unit of measurement as already fixed by law, as already administered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the greatest body of valuation experts we have, why can we not apply that same definition in the matter of valuation of water powers for recapture purposes? [Applause.] And we do that. We say:

"Net investment" in a project means the actual legitimate original cost thereof as defined and interpreted in the "Classification of investment in road and equipment of steam roads," issue of 1914, Interstate Commerce Commission.

Notice how carefully we have used the words "the actual legitimate original cost." No cost is allowed here for joy rides or for expenses of getting out prospectuses and things of that kind. It is the actual legitimate original cost that binds this commission in determining the value at recapture. And then we say that it shall be according to this classification. Have you read that classification? If you have not, permit me to say that it carefully defines the elements of cost that shall be considered; the charges or deductions that shall be made. It gives the accounts for investment in the minutest detail. If I had time I would be glad to go over them. It even covers the matter of water powers, because water powers are now being developed in connection with transportation by rail. It shows how the cost can be allocated to the various parts of the water-power project, as to dams, as to power houses, as to generators, as to transmission lines, as to turbines, as to all the elements that we have to deal with in this bill. They are all covered in the minutest detail under this classification of "net investment," and we import that into this bill because it is already the law.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I regret I can not; I have not the time. Net investment, moreover, embraces the original cost for the additions and betterments, the idea being that any honest additions and betterments should be charged to the capital account. But when all this is done we must make certain deductions or subtractions from the net investment when it comes to recapture.

What are they? We must deduct any "unappropriated surplus" that you may have in your treasury at the time of recapture.

I admit that there may be not much of such funds in the treasury of a water-power company at the end of 50 years, but whatever there is must be deducted from the "net investment," and by so much lessen the amount the Government would have to pay on recapture.

We deduct what else? We deduct the "aggregate credit balance of current depreciation accounts." In any well-regulated plant there are depreciation reserves held for all the various units of the plant that wear out. The experts know the life of the different units. They know the life of a turbine wheel. They know the life of a generator, the life of a transformer, the life of a transmission line. They say, "You must allow such a percentage of the cost price for depreciation purposes so that the given unit may be replaced when its useful life has ended." But sometimes these units may far outlive their ordinary life or period of usefulness. Those credit balances, therefore, to the credit of those particular depreciation accounts shall be deducted from the net investment upon recapture.

But that is not all of the deductions we make. We say, further, that "aggregate appropriations of surplus of income held in amortization, sinking fund, or similar reserves, or expended for additions or betterments" shall be deducted from net investment. As business is now conducted amortization, sinking fund, or similar reserves are now created out of surplus or income. Such funds are created as a matter of safety and good business. If there is any money in these funds or reserves at the date of recapture, it, too, must be deducted from the "net investment," thereby lessening the amount that the Government is to pay on recapture.

We do not even allow the investor, the lessee, to add the cost of additions and betterments that have been paid for out of the excess surplus. Even that is deducted. But that is not all. We say to the licensee, "You shall not add to your net investment anything that comes to you in the way of gifts or donations from individuals, a corporation, municipality, or State." All that is deducted. When all these things are deducted, the balance will represent the "net investment" which is payable on recapture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue—how long?

Mr. ESCH. I have promised time to other Members, and I shall not take their time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Take my time. Go ahead. Take it out of my time.

Mr. ESCH. I will take five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. ESCH. I wish to say further, Mr. Chairman, that under the "fair-value" plan will anyone tell me what is meant by "fair value"? Does anyone know? Nobody knows what "fair value" means. The courts for 40 years have been trying to define what you mean by "fair value." And they use different terms—"fair value," "reasonable value," "market value," and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] uses two or three different terms in the bill that he has fathered in previous Congresses. The Supreme Court tried to define it in the famous case of Smythe against Ames, decided by Justice Harlan 20 years ago, known as the Nebraska case, where the question came up as to what was the proper basis of valuation for fixing railroad rates, and the justice held that eight or nine different elements of valuation must be taken into consideration to determine the fair return on the fair value of the property, and the Supreme Court has repeatedly sought to define it ever since. It tried to do it in the San Diego water-power cases. It tried to do it in the famous Wilcox against the Consolidated Gas Co. case, and in the Minnesota rate cases. It has not been defined yet. We want to substitute for it "net investment," as determined by the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Determine it according to the elements of cost therein described.

Ah, that brings definiteness, gentlemen; and definiteness is one of the inducements to investment. If you have uncertainty or doubt as to your terms of recapture because of an indefinite basis or standard, there will be difficulty and trouble encountered in raising the money; and if you have trouble in raising the money you will have to pay a higher rate of interest. We put in "net investment" because it is definite, certain, and known, and we are already acting upon it and using it under existing law. So, then, by using "net investment" these licensees can borrow their money at cheaper rates than they could under this vague standard of "fair value." Do you know that 1 per cent difference in the rate of interest on the bonds of any of these water-power plants would in the course of 50 years pay over half of the plant's cost? And if it were amortized for 50 years, with interest compounded, it would practically pay the net investment?

If we can give a definition here so certain that capital will know its terms we will get the money at a lower rate of interest, otherwise the extra charge for interest must be borne by the consumer. For, do not forget, the consumer has got some interest in this proposition. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] said, "This bill is a guaranty to the investor that he will get back every cent he put into it." I deny it. All the replacements and renewals put into the plant are not to be paid back to the investor. We create depreciation reserves in this bill, and the money paid out of those reserves and put into the plant is not added to net investment, and therefore no part of it comes back to the investor.

Gentlemen, a main reason why I favor this net-investment plan is because of the certainty and the definiteness of it. We will have at any time a standard for the adjustment and fixing of rates which such licensee shall charge. We have not yet a standard of measurement for the fixing of the railroad rates of the United States. It was because of that reason that in 1913 we passed the physical valuation act. When that physical valuation is completed the commission will have a standard upon which it can fix the railroad rates of the country. By the net-investment principle here we, following the example of the Interstate Commerce Commission, will have a basis for rate making, so that at any time, any day or month or year, the books of the company will show the actual net investment and also the basis upon which the rates can be made. That is one of the greatest advantages in favor of the net-investment plan, and that alone would justify its adoption in this bill, because of the certainty of our standard. So for these reasons, gentlemen, because this amendment comes to you in an honorable way, comes with the prestige of such great men as Secretary Lane, Secretary Houston, the Secretary of War, and Commissioner Aitchison, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, I urge you to adopt it. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SISSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the following concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 51.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 25,000 copies of H. R. 12863, entitled "A bill to provide revenue, and for other purposes," together with the report No. 767 upon the same, as a House document, 2,000 copies to go to the document room of the House of Representatives, 21,750 copies to the folding room of the House of Representatives, and 1,250 copies to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that there be printed 10,000 as a Senate document for the use of the Senate.

in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

THE WATER-POWER BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SIMS. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment which I have offered should be approved, the Government would reserve the right to take back these properties at any time during the license period upon giving two years' notice to the licensee and paying the owners of the property their net investment.

I consider the character of the license to be granted under this bill of far greater importance than the rule for ascertaining the recapture price. If the Government can not retake the property until the end of 50 years, the purchase price should be the fair value at the time of recapture, not exceeding cost. If, however, the Government reserves the right to retake the property at any time, the net investment of the licensee should be the rule, in my judgment, for ascertaining the price. As between a 50-year irrevocable permit, with fair value of the property as the purchase price at the end of the license period and a grant which reserves the right of recapture at any time by paying the net investment of the licensee, the latter plan best protects the public interest and adequately safeguards the investors in the project.

While this bill provides for a license not exceeding a period of 50 years to water-power companies, it is intended by those who framed it and anticipated by those who will avail themselves of its provisions that the license will be issued for a full term of 50 years. It does not provide for competition among bidders for a license and an award to the one who offers to take the license for the lowest term of years, and the testimony before the committee indicates that 50 years is the term agreed upon by those who to a large extent are sponsors for the proposed legislation.

Under the recapture clause the Government is privileged to purchase the property of the water-power company at the end of the license period by paying the net investment in the plant. This is the first time net investment has been introduced into any water-power bill. Those that have previously passed the House have provided for a 50-year license, and the extraordinary length of the term has been urged on the ground that without it capital would not be invested in water-power projects, with the hazards and uncertainties incident to the business. These previous bills, however, have provided that in the event of recapture the Government would pay the fair value of the property at the time of taking, not exceeding cost.

The reasons heretofore urged for an irrevocable 50-year grant disappeared with the introduction of the net-investment plan for reimbursement in the event of recapture by the Government. Bondholders and stockholders may freely invest in these enterprises with full assurance that if the Government exercises its recapture option before the license expires the money they have put into the business will be repaid to them. It will be conceded that the net-investment recapture price is much more attractive to investors than a recapture price based upon the fair value of the property taken. Fair value is problematical, depending upon a multitude of circumstances and conditions at the time of recapture. Net investment is certain and easily computed at any time. Fair value may or may not bear a reasonable relation to the money invested, but net investment, as defined in this bill, represents the money that has been put into the enterprise, less accumulations from earnings above a fair return.

As between an irrevocable 50-year grant, with fair value of the property as the recapture price, and a revocable 50-year grant with a guaranty of the net investment if the grant should be revoked, the latter plan would best protect the public interest and make the law sufficiently attractive to the investor to assure the much needed development of our water power.

I introduce this amendment because I am opposed to an irrevocable 50-year grant. Whether the people wish to have the water power of the country developed and operated by the Federal Government or by the States I do not know, but I am quite certain that their right to have it done should not be cut off by an irrevocable half-century lease to private corporations. This bill is not a square deal to those who will come after us. If it should be enacted into law it would be an act of injustice that future generations may not easily condone. Much as I desire to develop our water power, I am unwilling that the freedom of action of those who are to come after us shall be contracted away in the manner proposed by this bill.

The water-power promoters want 50 years because it would be more valuable to them than a shorter term. If they could get 100 years, they would take it for the same reason, or better still, from their viewpoint, they would prefer a grant in perpetuity. But you and I are not here to carry out the wishes of the water-power companies or their promoters; we are here to serve the public interest, and we can do that best by providing for the development of our water power and, at the same time, leave the control of this great potentiality in the hands of the Government.

To grant these promoters an irrevocable 50-year license when our wasting water power can be developed without it is a legislative crime against the public of the first magnitude.

If my amendment is adopted the investment will be protected if the Government exercises its right of purchase. The public will buy the bonds of the water-power company, knowing that the word of the Government is good. Stockholders would have their investment returned to them.

The only safe thing to do is to put these companies on their good behavior, and take their license away from them if they fail in their obligations to the public.

We are told that regulation by State public-service commissions will protect the public from oppression and insure adequate service. Who among us, in the light of experience, is prepared to take regulation to his bosom and give it a 50-year vote of confidence?

We are enjoying the benefits of regulation in the Nation's Capital to-day. We have a street railway service that is unfit for the transportation of hogs and cattle. What is regulation doing for us?

Our experience with public-service corporations should warn us against giving them the right for 50 years to furnish power for our shops and light for our homes. Under this bill there will be no escape until the contract expires, and 50 years harks back almost to the Civil War.

If there is any water-power project that can not be developed within 50 years, the promoters had better leave it alone; it is too big a job for them to undertake.

No plea of urgency should persuade us to perpetrate a wrong against those who are not here to speak for themselves.

It has been our experience that public-service corporations, when clothed with long-term franchises, subordinate the public welfare to the interest of their stockholders. Using that experience as a lamp to guide us now, let us safeguard the public interest while we have the opportunity. Fifty years is a long time in which to extricate ourselves from the difficulties in which this legislation may involve us.

An irrevocable 50-year grant by the Federal Government would be an intolerable limitation upon the rights of the States. It would destroy their freedom of action should they become dissatisfied with the results of regulation and desire to change their policy. What champion of regulation is willing to predict for it a safe and successful journey until 1968?

If regulation failed to secure for consumers of light and power adequate service at a reasonable price, they would undoubtedly appeal to the State or Federal Government for relief, but these agencies would be powerless. If they desired to adopt a policy similar to that in force in the Province of Ontario, their hands would be tied by the irrevocable contracts contemplated by this bill. In this connection it might be interesting to note the success of Government ownership and operation of this utility in Ontario.

In 1900 the city of Toronto, with a population of 500,000, applied to the Legislature of Ontario for authority to generate power. The application was refused and a lease granted to a private company. Two years later the municipalities, boards of trade, and industrial associations met in convention and appointed a committee to confer with the Government with a view to securing authority that would enable municipalities to develop, distribute, and transmit electricity for light and power. Out of this movement grew the present law in the Province of Ontario, creating the hydroelectric commission, which is now operating 12 systems, furnishing electricity to 225 municipalitites in Canada.

Before a municipality can enter into a contract with the hydroelectric commission the question must first be submitted to a vote of the people. In every municipality in which the question has been submitted it has carried by overwhelming majorities ranging as large as 10 to 1.

The commission has invested $53,000,000 in transmission, distributing, and generating systems, and the municipalities $17,000,000. They are now distributing 310,000 horsepower, and in 1921 will have an available distribution of 750,000 horsepower and an investment of over $100,000,000. The commission is now developing two immense power plants—one at Niagara Falls and the other at Nipigon, on Lake Superior. The system is popular, and Sir Adam Beck, chairman of the commission, testified before our committee that the commission had difficulty in keeping pace with the applications of municipalities.

The rates to consumers, which are regulated by the commission, are sufficient to pay all operating costs, fixed charges, and depreciation, and amortize the debt in 30 years. A word now as to practical results to the consumers.

The average price of power to the 225 municipalities in Canada is $18 per horsepower, and the commission has made reductions annually. Sir Adam Beck testified that they were obliged to make reductions because the excess surplus earnings of the municipalities were such that if they had continued the rates originally established, based on one-half the cost the people were paying for power before the hydroelectric commission came into the field, the surplus would have been so large as to wipe out the whole debt of the municipality in 10 or 15 years.

The average domestic and commercial rate in the 225 municipalities is 2½ cents per kilowatt hour. Take the case of Toronto. When the commission began to deliver power to Toronto in 1912 it charged $18.50 per horsepower. They reduced the rate to $15 in 1913 and to $14.50 in 1916. When the hydroelectric commission entered the field, the domestic rate charged by the private company was 8 cents per kilowatt hour. That was for hydraulic, not steam, power. Last year the domestic rate was 2¾ cents per kilowatt hour. Before the government entered the field the commercial rate was 12 cents per kilowatt hour, plus 25 cents per month for meter rental. Last year the commercial rate for light averaged 2 cents per kilowatt hour.

In the city of Hamilton the commercial rate under private ownership was 8 cents per kilowatt hour. Last year the hydro rates averaged less than 1½ cents for the same service. In Kitchener, a city of 15,000 inhabitants, the average rate per kilowatt hour is 3½ cents. In the city of Galt the rate paid to a private company was 11 cents per kilowatt hour, water and steam combined. To-day the average rate is 2$\frac{5}{16}$ cents per kilowatt hour.

And these rates will retire the debt of these municipalities in 30 years.

Thirty or forty years ago legislative bodies in every large city in the United States were freely giving away valuable franchise rights to promoters of all public utilities, but legislators of to-day ought to realize that those conditions have passed away and that a new era has dawned. The constitutions of many States now prevent the granting of franchises on any terms unless the grant is approved by a vote of the people, and in elections already held the people have seldom ratified the grant.

Do the men who boldly advocate giving away the great water-power resources of this country to private corporations for 50 years realize what is going on around them? Do they realize that millions of people in America are now bearing the scars of many battles to loose the shackles with which private control of our public utilities has weighted them down, and that this bill in its present form is merely a challenge to fresh encounters?

Water-power promoters will pass away and be forgotten. The record we make here will live on as long as water flows. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, as I have yielded a part of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who opened so well, I had rather not be interrupted.

Mr. Chairman, this House can be proud of the work done in this bill. It proposes to put those who take and manage the great water powers of this country under the strictest regulation and control, adopting plans already approved in the management of railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

No Congress could ever afford in managing great affairs to get rid of the teachings of experience that we have in the working of that commission. We are dealing with many of the same subjects. We shall have to give the public the use of the water as we now give them transportation. The rates will have to be regulated, as in railroads, by the State, or by the United States in case of interstate rates. The foundation of all this will be first in the license and second in the system of accounts.

It is surprising that anyone should wish to get rid of the system of accounts which are called net investment. These accounts are governed in railroads by regulations printed in the volumes I hold in my hand. Here is an index of the whole. The rules as to investment is shown in this pamphlet, from which an extract is made in the hearings, but it refers also to these other volumes as to operating revenues, operating expenses of the railroad, classification of income, profit and loss, and the general balance of the accounts. Another gives rules as to who shall be regarded as employees and what sums can be fairly allowed, in what direction for employees. All these matters, which are of vital importance, are all connected together. Those accounts, if we are to regulate rates and see that business is fairly conducted, must be at hand and made up from year to year. Without them nothing can be done in the way of securing continual good management, not to speak of recapture. Recaptures are at the end of 50 years. Meanwhile the way these companies are to run depends on how they keep their accounts, subject to the approval of this commission composed of three Secretaries, and the work done by the commission in going over the accounts and in fixing the rates and seeing how the companies do their business. Yet it is proposed here by the first amendment to throw away that whole system of accounts by striking out the provisions for ascertaining the net investment. It is proposed by a second amendment to get rid of the very valuable provision in the license that surplus earnings over a fair return and over what is needed for amortization or paying off the capital account may, under the terms of the license, be apportioned between the men who run the property for profit and in reduction of rates for the benefit of the public.

It is thus proposed at the end of 50 years to leave the courts, in the adjustment of what shall be paid to the men who have been running that business, to a mere guess. Let us expand that thought for a moment. Give a licensee a water power and let him go ahead in his own way. It will be to his advantage to call everything investment, because when he puts money in a renewal, perhaps a dam that has broken out, he puts in a new dam and will be tempted to charge the cost of both dams to capital account and thereby increase the apparent income to distribute to the stockholders in the way of profits. He enlarges his profits and enlarges his investment account at the same time, so that it will look as though those profits were only fair; and at the end of the time he will say, "I have invested so many hundred millions of dollars, if you please, and have paid such a large rate of dividends that I am entitled to pay for the fair value of my property upon that basis." That could easily be done. The system of net investment will act differently. It says, if the licensee put in a betterment, that the cost of the old thing that was taken out at present prices, if it were new, shall be deducted from the cost of what is put in its place. It says if the value of the property is running down from year to year that the licensee must keep a depreciation account. It says that items of expenditure which are intended for maintenance shall be charged to current expenses and not to investment of capital. It therefore states truly in those accounts, so that he that runs may read, exactly what has been expended for capital accounts and what has been expended for income accounts, and the real net balance, so that there will be a real foundation to ascertain actual cost even if the provision be substituted that is offered and desired by way of amendment for section 14, that on recapture there shall be paid only the fair value, not to exceed the actual cost. These accounts will tell what the actual, real, legitimate cost was, yet it is proposed to strike it out. It is unheard of that the provision for accounts shall be struck out.

It is objected that the licensee will hold for 50 years. Why not? If the licensee behave propertly, why should it not hold? Is a man to go in and build up a business and be told that at any time on two years' notice and without cause his business shall be brought to an end? If he is serving the public and giving them good rates, must he be treated so? That is the proposition made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]. That is not the proposition made by this bill, but it is not true, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], that the bill provides no way of ending that term, because by section 26 in case of violation of the terms of the license or of the regulations of the commission the United States can at any time bring suit in equity for the revocation of that license or for the enforcement of its terms for fair rates and fair service to the public. The only difference is that instead of giving to any administration the power of its own will to revoke the charter of the licensee who is doing a public work exactly as the charter of the United States bank was once revoked—and we have had to get back a very large United States bank at this time in spite of that precedent—instead of giving that right to the particular party that is in, this right is given to the courts upon the representation of the commission to decide what shall be done with that license. Nothing could be fairer than this proposition contained in this bill. It is possible that even the wisest men may not always invest with actual skill, but if they do it in good faith the legitimate cost of what they do ought to be returned to them. If they have made mistakes in the valuation, there is power enough to find that out in the yearly valuations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The scheme of this bill in the end will do right by the public and by the licensee who is carrying on this enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the main thing before the committee is the question between the definition in section 10 and what follows it in section 14 of "net investment," and that which is in the original bill of the "fair value not exceeding the original cost." I am surprised at the gentlemen who have spoken in regard to the question of "net investment," in that it is a definite point at which you can fix the amount of money to be repaid to the licensee upon the recapture of the property. If there is anything unsound in the whole bill, it is that question of "net investment," as attempted to be defined in the bill.

I want, particularly, to call the attention of the committee again to the classification of the investment in the equipment of steam railroads prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission in accordance with section 20 of the act to regulate commerce, issue of 1914. It commences on page 15 and runs to page 29. It is the kind and character of items in the running of a railroad that should be charged upon the book accounts and nothing more. Nine-tenths of those items never would relate to the hydroelectric investment. Just look over what it is—bridges, trestles, tunnels, subways, gradings, rails, ties, and other track material, ballast, track laying, crossing and signs, snow and sand fences, and snow sheds. That is what this is, and it simply states what they shall put in their books, nothing more and nothing less—the most indefinite thing that has ever been attempted to be presented to the Congress, and the secretary of the commission wrote me not over three days ago that they have had to change this specification even to get the proper book value for railroads.

Now, for the purpose of getting some results out of this classification, Congress has appropriated in the neighborhood of—listen—I want to call this particularly to the attention of the committee—Congress has appropriated $16,300,000 for the purpose of getting the physical valuation of the railroads, and they are not completed yet, and here you have got your book account in reference to the net investment, and you are going to insert it in this bill when the Government itself is trying to get the physical value of these railroads, and up to date has expended the enormous sum of $16,300,000 and not one step has been made so far as the Government is concerned as to fixing the rates and fares——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will not the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not now; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SINNOTT. That was under the law of 1913.

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield; I want to proceed a little further on this question. When we recapture this property by fixing the fair value, not exceeding cost, a party will get what he is entitled to and what ought to be his. As was stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], Mr. Merrill, who came before the committee and presented this matter, was of the opinion, and you will find it on page 78 of the hearings—he wants to get back 100 per cent of all the money that the man has invested in the original enterprise, including actual depreciation for the physical structure. If what he has put in has been a failure, has not been workable, and he puts in another one, and then another at a large expenditure, he simply keeps it in a book account, and at the end of the 50 years we pay him back, either at that time or during the going of the concern, 100 per cent of all he has put in the property, although it may be entirely less valuable than that. Now, referring again to the Secretary of the Interior, I want particularly to call the attention of the committee to what the Secretary says on pages 452 and 453, and in response to a question of the gentleman from Oklahoma the Secretary admits that this question of net investment was not sponsored by him, and that it should be gone into further if it meant what it claimed in this bill. You will find it on those pages. It clearly shows the Secretary wanted time, and he did not stand for that net investment as it comes up in this report. The question of certainty is in the bill by making it the fair value not exceeding the cost of the project. Now, the man will get his actual cost, the amount that he paid for it, but he will not get any more by virtue of enhanced value because of the location of the property and the building up of the concern by the expenditure of other people's money and the donations of the Government. He would not get, as one gentleman suggested here who has just left the floor, the gentleman from New Jersey, a million dollars if the property is worth that much, because he is not entitled to it. If he invested a million dollars, and upon recapture that property is worth a million dollars, he ought to be repaid a million dollars, but if the entire concern is worth $3,000,000, and it has been enhanced by virtue of the unearned increment in the land and water right and the fact that a great community is built around it, he should not be given that extra $2,000,000 in which he did not invest. That is what the proponents of the net investment want in this bill. It does not say anything, it does not determine anything, it just simply gives that time, without relieving them of the charges that can be entered on a book account, and nothing else and nothing more. Then you have got to have experts galore, and how many millions of dollars you will have to pay no man can tell. This Government has already paid $16,000,000 and more to find out something of what the railroads have done and have not been able as yet to do it. But when you give him fair value for his property at the time you take it over, which shall not exceed the original cost, you are giving him all that to which he is entitled.

Now, I want to call attention to a fact. It may be old and sound unfamiliar to some, but I believe some have forgotten from what has been said on the other side of the House.

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

That is from section 1, Article II, of the Constitution of the United States. It sounds good to some of you, possibly, from the criticisms and speeches that have been made on the other side in the last three or four days by reason or certain letters that have been compiled and presented here. Article II, section 3, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

Now, following the imperative mandate of the Constitution, the President of the United States, in his annual message to Congress on December 4, 1917, recommended to the Congress in words as follows:

> It is imperatively necessary that the consideration of the full use of the water power of the country and also the consideration of the systematic and yet economical development of such of the natural resources of the country as are still under the control of the Federal Government should be immediately resumed and affirmatively and constructively dealt with at the earliest possible moment. The pressing need of such legislation is daily becoming more obvious.

Now, when the President called these several committees before him, in response to the message given and presented to Congress under the mandate of the Constitution, he presented to them a tentative bill in response to what he had submitted to the whole Congress, and the Committee on Rules believed that it should be done. The House unanimously appointed a special committee on water power. That committee proceeded to work, and after it had proceeded to work they placed in that bill a provision which the President, whose duty it was to recommend to Congress proper legislation, a provision which he believed under his duty to send a message to Congress, general or special, that the public interests of these great resources yet remaining to the public and had not yet been disposed of, was being placed in the bill in such a way that the Government's hands would be tied; that instead of treating the corporation and individual fairly it compelled the Government to guarantee, upon recapture of this property, what?

The original cost, all upkeep and betterments at full value, whether it was a working concern or not.

The gentleman says we might not take it over. Of course not if it is not a working concern. It ought to be a credit to Members on both sides of the House, and they ought to feel interested in a matter of this kind, when the President, under his constitutional duty to protect the people's property and their interests, sees that legislation is being presented in such a manner that a great property of the country may be forever legislated away, should call their attention to the fact, to the end that they might, in their mad rush to deliver this property to the corporations, pause for a moment and think about it, that in the end proper provisions might be put in here to protect the public and the consumer.

That is the reason the message was sent. It was sent properly and legitimately. And as I view it, under the constitutional provision any President would be derelict in duty, having taken the active part he has in recommending such legislation to Congress, having taken it as his duty to call the different committees together, having presented a bill, agreed upon in a way, or the general provisions of it, and then seeing that bill emasculated to the detriment of the public and seeing this property tied up to such an extent that it never could be recaptured—I say, any man holding a position of that kind would be recreant to his duty and faithless to the trust reposed in him by the people of this country if he sat idly by and permitted that to be done which he knows to be wrong after investigation, and not call their attention to the provisions, as he has done in this instance. And both sides ought to feel proud, the House ought to feel grateful, and I know it will feel grateful before it is through, for the assistance that has been extended to it not only in this piece of legislation, but in all other legislation that has been passed for the last six years in behalf and in the interest of the American people.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is the gentleman in favor of the Doremus proposition allowing the taking back at any time on proper notice during the 50 years?

Mr. RAKER. That matter is not before the committee now. I want to stand on this one question. I do not want it to be confused with the Doremus matter. The question is whether or not we are going to adopt a "net-investment" provision, an uncertain, indefinite book proposition, as the gentleman has advocated it, or whether you are going to adopt a suitable one, giving the Government an opportunity to recapture it at fair value not exceeding the cost of the project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I have before me an inventory of the volume of water-power possibilities in the United States and the percentage of development in various States. There is a maximum potential horsepower of 60,713,200, of which there has only been developed 5,321,699 horsepower, or 8.8 per cent. It is divided by States, and it will be interesting to refer to one or two of them.

In the State of Oregon, for instance, there is 7,505,000 horsepower; in the State of Washington there is 9,990,000 horsepower; in the State of North Carolina there is 1,000,000 potential horsepower; while in the State of Oklahoma there is only 235,500 horsepower, of which only seven-tenths of 1 per cent has been developed. I will ask leave to append this table to my remarks.

The purpose of this bill is to develop this unused water power and dedicate it to the service of the country, and the method by which it is proposed to do so is to induce private capital to enter upon its development. It is not a question under this bill of the United States or the States developing the power, but private capital. What is our duty in this respect? Evidently to frame such legislation as will primarily protect the public and at the same time induce the investment of capital in the development of this energy. If it is impossible to so frame a bill as to accomplish both of these purposes, we ought to have the frankness and the courage to acknowledge it and advocate Government development of hydroelectric energy.

But the committee, and, I take it, the country, feels that it is possible to frame such legislation. We have made abortive attempts to do so in the past. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, has reported at least two bills, which have passed the House, but did not become laws. We must frame a bill which will accomplish this joint purpose or else its enactment into law will be futile, and this great hydroelectric energy, the development of which is so essential for the progress of the country, will still remain inert.

As best I could, and with what ability I could command, I studied the provision as reported by the majority of the committee, known as the "net-investment" recapture clause. I read much of the evidence in the hearings. I read with particular interest all that was said by the Secretaries of Agriculture, Interior, and War advocating the net-investment plan. I became convinced that for reasons which I shall attempt directly in a brief manner to summarize that it does serve to protect the public and at the same time would in all probability invite investment of private capital.

This bill was reported to the House by the select committee on June 28, 1918, and since the bill was under consideration in the House the chairman of the committee read a letter from the President advocating what is known as the "fair-value" clause, which is set forth in the minority report by Mr. FERRIS, of Oklahoma. Not only as a Democrat, but as a citizen, I can say with entire candor that the President has no more ardent admirer and generally no more devoted follower than myself. But I can not surrender my conscience and my judgment to any man, because when I cease my efforts to be master of myself I lose my self-respect and do not deserve the respect of my fellows, even of the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Fair value? I was surprised to hear the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] say that fair value was certain and definite. I ran through the decisions of the courts which have defined fair value, and while I am not going to attempt to read them all to-day I will give to you one or two citations. One is from the final court of appeals of Oklahoma, and uses this language:

"Fair valuation," within bankruptcy act, section 1, when applied to real property, is such sum as the property will reasonably sell for to a purchaser desiring to buy, the owner wishing to sell, and when applied to merchandise, implements, and other personal property, such sum that may fairly be realized from the sale in bulk or in parcels in the usual and ordinary way of selling such classes of property for cash in the market, and when applied to notes and accounts is the net sum that may be with reasonable diligence realized from the collection thereof and not the amount as shown by their face, unless their face value is the "fair value." (Plymouth Cordage Co. v. Smith, 90 Pac., 418; 18 Okla., 249; 11 Ann. Cas., 445.)

Does that sound certain and definite? I will read you another citation:

The term "fair valuation," as used in bankruptcy act, July 1, 1898, (ch. 541, 30 Stat., 544), means the present market value and the value that the debtor might realize thereon if permitted to continue in business.

Does that apply? Would that be applicable in all fairness in ascertaining the value of the property? That is from the Eighty-fourth Southeastern Reporter, page 895. Here is another:

This suit involved the construction of the words "to pay the fair and equitable value," as used in "An act empowering a city to grant by ordinance the right to erect and operate water works for the use of the city for a period of 20 years, and to renew the grant for another such term, reserving the right to acquire the works (Act Mo., Mar. 24, 1873), provided that at the expiration of the 20 years, if the grant should not be renewed, the city should purchase the works, and, if the price could not be fixed by agreement, pay therefor the 'fair and equitable value.'"

The "fair and equitable value" of the works, to be paid therefor by the city under such act, should not be determined by the capitalization of the earnings—thereby in effect valuing the franchise, which no longer existed—nor should such a value be limited to the cost of the reproduction of the plant, but allowance should be made for additional value created by the fact of connections with and supply of buildings, although the company did not own the connections. (National Waterworks Co. v. Kansas City, 62 Fed. Rep., p. 853.)

This last definition of fair value appears to have been adopted in the last edition of Bouvier's Law Dictionary. These decisions which I have read from the courts of the country will show how difficult it is to apply the decisions of the courts in enabling the jury of award to ascertain the fair value of any property. "Fair value" is indefinite. "Fair value" will attract no capital, because the investor knows that his investment is hazardous and that upon the plant being taken over by the Government the amount to be returned to him will be subject to the varying opinions of the judge laying down the law and to the caprices of the jury of award which will be called upon to pass upon the fair value of his property.

By the way, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says that four times the House has passed bills setting up this criterion. I asked him if he favored the language used in the bill reported by his committee and passed by this House on January 8, 1916, and he said he did. That bill uses the words simply "fair value." It does not use the limiting words, that it "shall not exceed the cost of the property."

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman read it?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; I will leave it for the gentleman to read. He will find it cited in his minority report at the bottom of page 42. It is contained in section 5 of that bill. The gentleman will not arise and state that I am in error. The bill to which I am referring states that the United States shall pay "before taking possession the fair value of such property," and there are no words limiting fair value so that it shall not exceed the cost of the property.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman ought to go on and state that the limitation is placed on the growth of all nonappreciable stock.

Mr. SMALL. I can not understand what the gentleman means by the expression of a limitation "on the growth of all nonappreciable stock." I repeat my former statement that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] advocated a water-power bill which passed the House on January 8, 1916, which established simply the "fair value" as the criterion for ascertaining the amount to be repaid for the water-power plant in the event of recapture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Could the gentleman from Wisconsin yield me five minutes more?

Mr. ESCH. I can yield two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, in that time I can only say that "fair value" as interpreted by the courts may well exceed the actual cost of the property.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will yield to you. I will be more generous than you were to me. If fair value is given, then they ought to give at least the cost of the property. The gentleman knows that the courts have frequently decided that the fair value and just compensation may greatly exceed the original cost of the property. If the House should decide to strike out the "net investment" provision in this bill and insert a provision substituting the "fair value" of the plant or the amount to be repaid, it will not be in the interest of the Government. Yet this is what the gentleman advocated in the bill which passed the House in January, 1916.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman merely wants to preserve that as an accounting provision, why not add to that "not to exceed the cost"? Then he would at the same time preserve the interest of the public.

Mr. SMALL. I ask the gentleman to say whether or not I was right in the statement I made, that in his bill of 1916 it contained "fair value" without limitation? I can not yield further.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has just asked me a question. I want to read the language.

Mr. SMALL. I have not the time to permit you to read it. Gentlemen here can read it for themselves. I have not time in two minutes. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is not fair.

Mr. SMALL. Gentlemen can read the minority report and read the language that the gentleman from Oklahoma set up in the minority report of that bill that passed the House in 1916, and then they will be convinced that I am correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. SMALL. Can the gentleman give me one minute more?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. SMALL. This provision of "net investment," limited as it is, first, by deducting from the actual cost the accumulated surplus; second, depreciation of property during the period of the license; and, third, amortization of reserves, may well, at the end of the 50-year period, not only reduce greatly the amount that the United States is to pay for the property in recapturing it, but it is entirely possible, if it is a profitable venture, that the United States will have nothing whatever to pay in recapturing the property. It is within the power of this commission to fix the amount of the net profits which the investors are to receive. It is within their power to fix the manner of expenditure in the construction of the property and to lay down the method in which depreciation accounts shall be kept, and to say what shall be the accumulation of profits which shall be amortized and shall become amortization reserves; and altogether, it seems to me, in the language of the Secretary of Agriculture, that it abundantly protects the public and will invite investment for the development of hydroelectric energy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this bill a very singular spectacle is presented to the House and country. Early last winter three great committees were disorganized for the purpose of forming a committee to consider water-power legislation. Four months were devoted by that newly formed committee to the legislation, to the consideration of a bill called "the administration bill." This bill was reported to the House on June 28, with certain amendments suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Agriculture. On August 20, several months after the committee was formed and more than two months after the bill was reported to the House, the general debate was concluded. Two days after the general debate was concluded, and also on August 27, seven days after the conclusion of general debate, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] received letters, dated August 22 and August 27, from the President of the United States requesting that the bill in its original form be passed.

I can not think, Mr. Chairman, that the President has been fully and wisely advised, for without assigning any reason to this House except an erroneous one, he asks us to abandon the work of the committee and return to the original so-called "administration bill." Now, my time is limited. I can only give you a very brief sketch. The chief point in issue is over the recapture price—whether it should be fair value or net investment—a highly abstruse, technical, and intricate subject, a subject about which the President could not have full information unless he had devoted months to the matter; and I doubt if the President, with his many cares and burdens, has had time to look carefully into this matter.

We have those letters from the President. Mr. Chairman, this is not war legislation. In all war legislation I have followed and voted for the President's requests. In other matters I give careful and respectful consideration to whatever he has to say to the House. When those utterances bear evidence of his mature and thoughtful consideration, they are persuasive and should not be disregarded except for the most cogent reasons. But when those utterances bear upon their face positive evidence that they are not the result of mature and deliberate consideration, but that they spring from misinformation, from ill advice, or from any other cause that may disconcert or disturb his mind, they should be weighed accordingly.

As illustrations of inconsiderate utterances we have "too proud to fight," "peace without victory," "the Republican Party has not had a new idea in 30 years," and that "Senator CHAMBERLAIN was guilty of an unjustifiable distortion of the truth." These utterances do not show the President at his best; nor do I think these letters sent to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] show the President at his best.

EXCERPTS FROM CONGRESSIONAL GOVERNMENT BY WOODROW WILSON.

From the calm and cloister of Princeton he tells us what I read last Thursday, on page 273 of his book on Congressional Government. I have not the time to repeat it, but he says there that the representatives of the people are the proper ultimate authority in all matters of government, that administration is merely the clerical part, that this principle is inseparably of a piece with all Anglo-Saxon usage.

Again, on page 303 of his work on Congressional Government, he tells us:

> It is the proper duty of a representative body to look diligently into every affair of government and to talk much about what it sees. It is meant to be the eyes and the voice, and to embody the wisdom and will, of its constituents. Unless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the Government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served; and unless Congress both scrutinize these things and sift them by every form of discussion, the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct. The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function. The argument is not only that discussed and interrogated administration is the only pure and efficient administration, but, more than that, that the only really self-governing people is that people which discusses and interrogates its administration.

Having in mind these peerless precepts from Princeton, I feel free and invited to discuss these remarkable and belated letters, six months overdue, letters that could have been sent to this great committee at any time within the past six months, if those who inveigled and cajoled the President into writing these letters were disposed to give fair treatment to this great committee or even to the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture. The gentleman from Tennessee in his letter to the President on August 22 writes of the part that Mr. Merrill and the three Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture had in presenting the net-investment amendment to the committee. No one is mentioned in this connection in this letter except Mr. Merrill, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Agriculture. They are mentioned 13 or 14 times in connection with Mr. Merrill, and that letter does not give to the President a true narration of what took place in the committee or of the committee amendments. No wonder the President felt outraged and angered, and expressed his resentment as he did. From the viewpoint of Mr. SIMS's letter the President's resentment was justified. This letter of August 22 of Mr. SIMS brings a rejoinder from the President saying that he did not see the draft of the amendments "introduced by Mr. Merrill and his associates," and that he did not approve them. "Mr. Merrill and his associates," the three great Cabinet officers—Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture—referred to as "Mr. Merrill and his associates"! Is this the fruit of that consolidation, cooperation, and coordination that we were promised under the Overman consolidation bill? "Mr. Merrill and his associates"! Oh, a cruel thrust! That letter, gentlemen, was not the result of mature thought. The President was not in possession of the exact facts or he would not have uttered that slur, "Mr. Merrill and his associates." If that is not so, is that a reecho from page 269 of Congressional Government, by Woodrow Wilson?

> So low, indeed, has the reputation of some of our later Cabinets fallen, even in the eyes of men of their own political connections, that writers in the best of our public prints feel at liberty to speak of their members with open contempt.

Is this a reecho of that? If so, I will say—

> In noble minds some dross remain,
> Not yet purged out of spleen and sour disdain.

But before I get through I propose to defend the President and to show that from his viewpoint, biased by some one, he was justified. I would not have you think it a case of—

> Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
> Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike!

No; it is not; for the President was beguiled, deceived, and decoyed into writing that letter, and also the letter of August 22.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] tells us that about June 15 the President told him these amendments were not submitted to him and that he disapproved of them. Is that the cause and front of some one's offending, that the amendments were not submitted by the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture? Is that the cause of this false and misleading newspaper propaganda spread broadcast since the filing of the report on the bill, imputing to this Water Power Committee an unholy alliance with the alleged water-power grabbers? The amendments not submitted to the President! Would you have the President in that class—

> Bless'd with each talent and each art to please,
> And born to write, converse, and live with ease?
> Should such a man, too fond to rule alone,
> Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne?

No! I propose before I get through to exonerate and exculpate the President from any such insinuations or aspersions.

Why, from Princeton we learned that the representatives of the people are the proper ultimate authority in all matters of government, and that "the power of making laws is in its very nature and essence the power of directing, and that power is given to Congress, and that that principle is inseparably of a piece with all Anglo-Saxon usage."

That is what he told us from Princeton, and now would you have "the teacher's chair become a throne" when water-power legislation is considered, so that a President may—

Like Cato, give his little [Congress] laws
And sit attentive to his own applause?

From such aspersions I propose to exonerate and exculpate the President.

What is at the bottom of all this, Mr. Chairman? How was the President misled? Early in August the press began to teem with inspired articles instigated by some one about water-power rights being grabbed in perpetuity. I have the articles here. Here is an article from the Washington Times early in August, which says:

PRESIDENT FIGHTS UNJUST DAM LEASE.

President Wilson to-day let it be known through Congressman SCOTT FERRIS, of Oklahoma, that he is opposed to the clause in the present water-power bill that would force the public to pay an exorbitant price to regain control of water-power sites leased to private corporations by the Government.

The bill as now written provides for 50-year leases, with a provision that these leases could be repurchased at the end of that time by paying the original investment of the private corporation.

"The President feels, as I do, that the public should be forced to pay only actual value and not the original investment," said FERRIS. "He will also fight to force corporations with water-power leases to show why their leases should be continued at the end of the 50-year period instead of forcing the Federal Government to show why the lease should not be continued."

And then the other day another newspaper had headlines:

Chairman SIMS warns the President of stealthy changes in the bill.

What rot and nonsense; changes that were considered publicly in the committee for over six months.

And then again here is another piece of propaganda:

Water-power rights in perpetuity to be stopped. Elimination of dangerous clause in the bill urged by the President.

Just think of the duplicity in that Times article! Corporations will be made to show why their leases should be continued at the end of the 50-year period. Why, the lease term is in section 6 of the bill, and there was not the slightest amendment offered to that, although the gentleman from Oklahoma was present when it was read, and yet early in August Mr. FERRIS says "the President feels as I do." Why, the original administration bill provided for a continuance of the lease. The committee struck that out and put in an absolute limit of 50 years, and yet this propaganda has gone forth across the country. I have seen it in the Pacific coast papers, in the Washington papers, and I saw it in New York papers. Why should not the President be distracted and disturbed at all this deception? What is the history of this? We find from the first that the chairman of the committee, even before his own report—the majority report—was printed, which does not contain a word of defense of the "net-investment" amendment—we find him "hotfooting" it to the White House and presenting to the President the proposed minority report opposing the net-investment provision. No wonder the President is distracted. The minority report does not give to the President or to anyone else a correct statement of what the committee did. It begins with a barrage fire of explosive expletives such as "water-power interests," "bondholders," "electrical promoters," "bond brokers," "investment bankers," and all that, and it also charges that the committee itself had changed the administration bill; that it had departed from the bill agreed upon by the Secretaries; but there is not a word in that minority report, which reached the President early in June, informing him that the net-investment provision was the provision agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Agriculture—not a word that these three Secretaries wrote letters and testified before the committee in favor of "net investment."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman eight minutes more.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I can not; the gentleman would not yield to me. The time is too short to go into this matter. I can not yield. You can not discuss this in an hour, and you could not fully discuss in an hour the way in which the President was beguiled and decoyed and deceived into sending these letters. He must have thought, from reading that minority report, that we were a band of highwaymen and looters. But here, gentlemen, is the piece de resistance from the New York Globe of August 17. If the President ever read that, I marvel at the moderation of the language in his two letters. It is two columns long. I can read only a part of it. Listen to the headlines:

ONE MAN BEATS POWER COMBINE—THREE CABINET MEMBERS AND ALL BUT ONE COMMITTEEMAN FAVORED WATER-GRAB BILL—FERRIS WINS WILSON'S HELP—INSISTS ON "ACTUAL COST" RECAPTURE CLAUSE AND WINS "DAVID-GOLIATH" FIGHT.

Our worthy chairman does not even escape misrepresentation.

But the pressure for the views of the three Secretaries was strong, and the committee finally accepted the "net-investment" plan and voted the bill out. Everybody, even Chairman SIMS, concurred, except FERRIS. With the other 14 committeemen and 3 Cabinet officers against him he won.

Now, listen to this from the New York Globe:

"DAVID" WINS HIS FIGHT.

Going out into the arena to fight 3 members of the Cabinet and the other 14 members of his committee, FERRIS presented a fine spectacle of a modern David with Goliaths all around him. But we guessed he knew a trick as good as David's with the pebble. He started for the White House, showed the President through the whole thing from start to finish, and, coming away, announced that he was promised the support of the President to rip out the "net-investment" project and restore the "fair-value" plan.

The other members of the committee, who had, of course, supposed they were doing exactly what the President wanted, were shocked on hearing that they had him against them.

I used to know something about the Bible. I have forgotten a good deal of it, but that beautiful story of David and Goliath recurs to us and you all remember it. David the stalwart, Goliath the Philistine, and Saul the leader.

An evil spirit troubled Saul.

And Saul said unto his servants, Provide me now a man that can play well, and bring him to.

Then answered one of the servants, and said, Behold, I have seen the son of Jesse the Bethlehemite, that is cunning in playing and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the Lord is with him.

Now, he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance and goodly to look to.

And David came to Saul and stood before him, and he loved him greatly, and he became his armor-bearer.

I might explain in biblical times an armor-bearer approached the dignity in position in modern times of the chairman of a national congressional committee. [Laughter and applause.]

And it came to pass that the Philistines gathered together with armies to battle.

And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and Israel stood on a mountain on the other side, and there was a valley between them.

Goliath the Philistine came forth and boasted for 40 days about what he would do. Goliath, not David, did this. David accepted the challenge with Saul's permission.

And Saul armed David with his armor and sword, but cautious David said unto Saul:

I can not go with these, for I have not proved them.

Our modern David, not so cautious, accepts the weapons proffered, the two letters, without proving them. But to recur to biblical times. David prevailed over Goliath with his own sling and good right arm.

But there was no sword in the hand of David.

He had neither Saul's sword nor pen.

Had our modern David examined the weapons presented to him by modern Saul, what weakness would he have found in them had he proven the weapons as David the Israelite would do? First, this assertion that Congress has passed four times a water-power bill with the identical recapture clause is a mistake. The President must have gotten that misleading statement from the minority report. Congress has not passed it four times, or three times, or two times. Perhaps once it has passed a somewhat similar clause. The Ferris bill of 1914 recapture clause is not at all identical with the one in this bill—is not limited to the actual cost. It allows appreciation to be considered. The Ferris bill of 1916 is not so limited. It permits appreciation, also the going value, to be estimated, which was held in the Denver water case at $800,000. Surely the President, in his letter of August 22, did not mean knowingly to approve of appreciation and intangible values.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] himself would not support that recapture clause in his prize bill of 1916. Neither would the President if he knew what it contained. I supported that once before because I did not know its danger. I knew nothing then about fair value or the net investment, but I have since made some study of it. It is futile in such a short time to try to explain these matters. Let me call your attention to what the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] spoke of in respect to the valuation of railroads. He mentioned the valuation act. That does not follow the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of 1914 at all, because the act providing for that valuation was passed in 1913 and they had a different classification at that time. He told us the other day that they had changed it a number of times. The gentleman is mistaken. There has been no change except one slight change. He did not have the classification before him. All he had was their statistical abstract, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows it. You might as well try to interpret the Christian religion by reading an extract from the Koran, and that is as close as the gentleman from California ever got to a correct interpretation of the cost classification of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR].

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my experience of two terms as a Member of this body the water-power question has been nothing more nor less than a political football. It has been kicked around between the House and Senate in season and out of season, and all the while our undeveloped water power has been wasting—tumbling over the rocks to the sea level. It is high time to get busy and enact a water-power bill that will attract capital and bring about the development which is sure to come where water powers are now harnessed. The Special Water Power Committee of the House has gone into every phase of the question now before us, has labored for months, and has brought a good bill into the House. It is now proposed to scuttle this bill by substituting the so-called "fair-value" recapture clause for the "net-investment" recapture provision, as recommended by the committee. If the bill should be scuttled in this manner, it will not be worth the paper that it is written on. This proposal to substitute was made because of presidential recommendation—the result of an "S. O. S." call sent to the other end of the Avenue. The substitute recapture clause strikes at the very vitals of the measure——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCARTHUR. No. I will not. The gentleman would not yield to me awhile ago. As I was saying, this proposed substitute of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] strikes at the very vitals of the bill and if adopted will render the bill useless as a piece of constructive legislation. We must not forget that those who propose to develop water power under congressional authority must go into the open market and compete with other industries, and possibly with other countries, for the necessary money to make the initial improvements and put the properties on a paying basis. The development of water power means much to the people, and they are the ones who will suffer because of lack of development. The people are now suffering by reason of the delay in this legislation, and yet gentlemen come into the House with their time-honored bugaboo about the Water Power Trust and the Money Trust and a lot more demagogy and buncombe which sounds good during a political campaign. They tell us that the rights of the people are about to be frittered away.

Let us face this question in a businesslike and courageous manner. Let us give to the country a piece of constructive legislation that will attract capital and develop our resources and at the same time protect the public interests. We can not do this by clinging to antiquated ideas about the recapture clause. We hear much of the word "recapture." I regard it as a misnomer. It may be recapture as applied to water rights, but in so far as the physical properties are concerned they will be put there by the water-power developers at their own expense, and if the Government should take the properties at the end of the lease it would be a case of "capture" and not "recapture," as the Government would be getting something that it never owned before—something put there by other people's money. Let us be fair about this; let us enact legislation which will really attract capital and stop this great national waste that is now going on. Let us give to the country a bill which will command respect and confidence—one for which we need make no apology.

I feel that there are elements in this House that do not want private capital to develop our water-power resources. They want to make this bill as onerous and odious as possible, to the end that there will be no development and that the Government will eventually have to step in and develop the country's water power. I regret that such a feeling exists among even a small minority of the membership of this House, for we have too much of this Government ownership idea and too much of socialism in the air at the present time. Let us give the business of the country a chance to expand under proper regulations. Let us build up our resources, rather than scuttle them for the purpose of playing cheap politics. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I think I have still 20 minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the issue presented by the amendments offered by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] may be stated in this way: Do the amendments offered by those gentlemen offer a greater protection to the substantial rights of the Government and therefore to the substantial rights of the people, on the one hand and primarily, and, secondarily, do they offer to private capital—for this bill operates upon the idea of the development of water power by private capital—such inducements as will invite them to invest their money in water-power development? I would be quite content, so far as I am concerned, to let the question be determined entirely upon the basis of the intrinsic and substantial merits of the two propositions were it not for the fact that there has been injected into it a matter incidental and extraneous but yet designed to influence—I will not say prejudice—the minds of Members of this House upon the real question involved. I think I can best demonstrate what I have in mind by reading just a few lines from the letter written by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] to the President of the United States that appears in the RECORD on page 10505. After recounting the steps in the origin and consideration of this bill and the amendments which were suggested to it by the three Secretaries, the gentleman from Tennessee says:

> For instance, the bill you gave us provided for a license period of not exceeding 50 years. This had been changed to a specific, arbitrary 50-year period with no power to provide for a less period without the consent of the licensee.

Now, listen:

> A second license period was provided for the holder of the original license, and the tender of this second license was made mandatory upon the part of the commission.

At the time the gentleman from Tennessee wrote that letter to the President of the United States he had reported this bill. He knew that the amendment to which he referred in this letter relating to the extension of the license period had been voted out of the bill in the committee. What purpose did the gentleman from Tennessee have in writing to the President of the United States that the amendment rejected by the committee was still in the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. ANDERSON. Unless it was the purpose of the gentleman from Tennessee to furnish to the President an argument to accomplish his purpose of defeating the net-investment amendment, which was both false in fact and fallacious in theory.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield.

Mr. SIMS. My letter does not bear any such construction, that the tender of the second terms is in the reported or amended bill. It was an amendment that was in the second bill which I referred to. That is the fact, and that is what the letter meant, and any other construction is not warranted.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman very clearly led the President of the United States to believe that this provision was in the bill, and correspondence between the gentleman and the President bears intrinsic evidence of the fact.

Mr. SIMS. In the reported bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. For in the President's letter to the chairman of the committee he says:

> I am free to reply to it that I did not see the draft of amendments to the water-power bill which were introduced by Mr. Merrill and his associates—

Not the amendment, not the net-investment amendment, but "the amendments." I quote again:

> I do not approve of them.

Does the President refer there only to the net-investment amendment, or does he refer to the amendment stricken out of the bill in the committee which extended the license period? The gentleman from Tennessee can answer that, if he can. But, Mr. Chairman, the President goes further in his letter, and I refer now to the letter of August 22:

> I am very much concerned about this feature of the bill and have had the privilege of being so intimately associated with those who have from time to time conferred about it that I am venturing to make this earnest suggestion.

This record bears the intrinsic evidence of the fact that before this bill was reported, and after it had been voted out by the committee, somebody took to the President of the United States the minority report of this bill, which carried the identical implication carried in the letter of the gentleman from Tennessee, to the effect that there remained in the bill a provision which, the gentleman from Oklahoma says, practically granted to the licensee a license in perpetuity. If I believed, as the President was evidently led to believe, that this bill provided a license in perpetuity, I would have taken exactly the same position that he did, and I regret that the President has been misled into a position from which I think he might be very glad to withdraw. I refer once again to the President's letter of the 22d:

I am going to venture to say to you as chairman of the Special Water Power Committee what I hope that you will not think that I am taking too great a liberty in saying, namely, that inasmuch as the House of Representatives has four times passed a water-power bill, each time with a recapture clause, practically identical with the pending water-power bill as it was originally proposed by the administration and agreed upon in informal conference—

And so forth.

Now, it is true that there is a similarity in language between the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma and the recapture clauses which have heretofore passed the House of Representatives, but that is a similarity and not an identity of language or an identity of effect. The first bill referred to by the gentleman from Oklahoma, and all of them for that matter, divided the property to be taken into two classes, and so taken, and establishes a different basis of payment as to each class. One of those classes included land, rights of way, and interests in lands. The other class included structures, dams, locks, and transmission lines.

In the first case one of the bills provides that the actual cost shall be paid, another one says that the fair value shall be paid, the third one says the actual cost to the grantee shall be paid, and the fourth one says reasonable value not exceeding actual cost shall be paid. Will a fair interpretation of the language justify the claims that they are identical in effect although they may be similar in language?

Again, as to structures, transmission lines, and property of that character, these four recapture clauses provide, in one, that fair value shall be paid; second, fair value shall be paid; third, reasonable value shall be paid; and, fourth, that fair value shall be paid. They are not identical in terms.

But the thing I want to point out in particular is that in making the distinction that was made in these recapture clauses it was intended that appreciation should be allowed in determining the price to be paid on recapture, and as the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] has said, in one instance, good will and going concern were also included. There is no identity between the four recapture clauses heretofore passed and the one which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] now proposes. So the President was misled in this as in the other feature to which I have referred.

Now, I want to refer just for a few moments to the intrinsic merits or demerits of the two propositions. The fundamental, and, I think, the most important, advantage of the net-investment basis is that of certainty, and that certainty means a certainty not only at the end of the 50-year period but a certainty of the amount invested every day, every month, and every year during the entire period of the lease. It means more than that. It means a certainty to the investor when he puts his money into the plant. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has said, that certainty means a reduction in the interest rate to be charged upon the amount invested in the plant, and that reduction in the interest rate is itself again reflected in a reduction in the rates which will be charged to consumers. Every element of uncertainty injected into the basis of recapture will eventually be reflected in increased rates to the man who pays the bill.

As I have suggested, the fair-value plan proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma carries appreciation in structures and transmission lines. In other words, his basis would provide for the payment in the case of recapture of cost plus appreciation but less the deterioration. Figured out, that might mean, and probably would mean, a sum far in excess of the amount which would be paid under the net-investment plan. A net-investment plan, on the contrary, provides for the payment of actual, legitimate cost less depreciation and less amounts which have accumulated in amortization. For instance, suppose you have structures on a dam site costing $50,000. Immediately upon beginning the construction of those structures a depreciation fund is set up to take care of the annual depreciation of the property. The depreciation is calculated upon a basis sufficient at the end of the life of the structure to replace it. But suppose at the end of the period a sufficient amount has not been accumulated? In that event the difference is made up from operating revenue, not from capital. So that in that event even the capital would not be increased by the difference between the amount which you had in the depreciation funds and the value of the property at the end of its life. Sometimes the other situation occurs, and you have accumulated an amount more than sufficient to pay at the end of the license period for the depreciation upon the property. In that event the Government would get the benefit of the balance.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. SEARS. I understood the gentleman to state that under the present plan the Government would take over this project at the net investment less the depreciation. I find nothing in the bill that so states.

Mr. ANDERSON. Less the credit balance in the depreciation account.

Mr. SEARS. There is nothing in the bill to that effect.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, yes. If the gentleman will refer to the net investment definition he will get the information.

Mr. SEARS. In that case the railroad owns the land. In this case the Government owns the land.

Mr. ANDERSON. That would not have any effect on the situation at all. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has suggested that another advantage in this provision of net investment is in rate making. It provides an absolute and determinable basis upon which rates may be based. We have had enough experience with railroad-rate making, undertaken without any basis at all, to appreciate the necessity of beginning now, when we can enter upon the books every element of cost, to require the keeping of the accounts of these licensees in such a way that the Government may know at any moment just what amount the licensee has invested in the plant. That can not be possible under any other plan than the one proposed in this bill.

I voted for the fair-value clause in the four water-power bills to which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] refers. In my feeble way I supported them so far as I could, but when I did so I did not marry them for the rest of my natural life. I reserved the right then and I reserve it now to vote for some other plan which I believe is better and which better protects the interests and the rights of the people, and which I believe gives such greater certainty to the whole proposition as to invite the development of water power. It seems to me that where three Cabinet officers and a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission and a committee especially created and authorized for the purpose have considered a piece of legislation such as this, have given to it months of consideration, and have brought out a proposition as scientific, as comprehensive, as certain as this, that their conclusions ought to have some weight with the Members of this House. And I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will not prevail.

Mr. Chairman, in my remaining time I desire to have read at the desk an amendment which I intend to propose at the end of the pending section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 14 the following: "Provided, That the right of the United States or any State or municipality to take over, maintain, and operate any project licensed under this act at any time by condemnation proceedings upon the payment of just compensation is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. All the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin is exhausted, except half a minute. The gentleman from Tennessee has 21 minutes remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin reserved 10 minutes for me, but I was unavoidably absent from the Chamber. I do not want to delay a vote, and yet I am anxious to make a few remarks on these amendments. I would like to get about 10 minutes, if possible.

Mr. SIMS. I am willing, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman shall have five minutes of my time.

Mr. MONDELL. I am afraid I can not say all I desire in that time. I might in eight minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I am sorry that the gentleman did not stay here to keep a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that I may proceed.

Mr. CANNON. I understood we were going to be fair about this matter.

Mr. MONDELL. I was called out of the Chamber and could not get back.

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes, and lose it myself.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes in addition.

Mr. FERRIS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the committee—and the record kept by the clerks will show—that Mr. SIMS, the chairman, said that at the end of this time, if they would agree to his request, if the occasion arose and it seemed necessary, he would be willing to agree to additional time.

Mr. FERRIS. Did the chairman say that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all this discussion is out of order.

Mr. SIMS. I said that rather than extend it another hour I would be willing, if it seemed necessary, to agree to additional time. I recall that statement. I am willing to stand by it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was asking for four hours. I think that the gentleman from Wyoming ought to have some time under the circumstances.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, in addition to the five minutes granted to him by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. No; I will retain my time. Let the gentleman ask for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to enter into the very interesting little family misunderstanding that seems to have arisen in the administration relative to the recapture provision of this bill, although I was just a little surprised that the President, in his correspondence with the chairman of the committee, should have referred to his honorable Secretary of War, his honorable Secretary of the Interior, and his honorable Secretary of Agriculture, three of the ablest and strongest men in the Cabinet, as the "associates" of a minor employee of the Department of Agriculture. It did not seem to me to be quite a seemly reference by the President to those honorable gentlemen who occupy such exalted positions.

The President predicates his objection to the recapture provision, which has the indorsement of these three members of his Cabinet, on the ground that at four different times the House adopted the provision which is now offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. I am rather of the opinion that neither the President nor the gentleman from Oklahoma is in just the best possible position in the world to take that particular position with regard to legislation. It is not so long ago—in fact, it is very recent—that the gentleman from Oklahoma brought into the House, contrary to the wishes of his committee, and insisted on a certain provision in the oil bill as a substitute for a provision that the House had unanimously approved three different and distinct times. And the gentleman from Oklahoma assured us that his insistence on the change was based upon the wish and desire of the President. While not a member of the committee approved the change, as I understand it, the gentleman insisted on it, drastic and revolutionary as it was, superseding a provision that the House had three times accepted.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The committee did agree to it, and the House did agree to it, and the House passed it and, I think, would do so again.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps I should not say the committee did it under coercion. The committee did it under the persuasive power of the gentleman from Oklahoma, fortified by the compelling argument I have mentioned.

Mr. FERRIS. I am sorry I have not the power that the gentleman says I have.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is very persuasive. Now, the fact that the House four times adopted a certain provision without getting anywhere, without accomplishing anything, without securing the acceptance or approval of another body, instead of being an argument in favor of the thing, affords the strongest sort of presumptive evidence that there is something faulty about the proposition. It did not appeal to the gentlemen of another body any one of the four times, and it did not especially appeal to the Members of this House, although it seemed to be the best thing we had before us at that time.

Now, what are the facts in regard to these two propositions? There is no difference, I assume, between the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Oklahoma and myself as to what we desire to accomplish. What is that? The largest possible power development in the best possible way and the lowest possible rates and the best possible service. The question is how we are to accomplish these desired and desirable results. The gentleman from Oklahoma thinks that we can best accomplish them through the proposition he favors. I believe he is mistaken, and for these reasons: We can only secure complete development under conditions that tend to stability and that present no artificial legislative elements of uncertainty. His recapture clause is a gem of uncertainty. It presents a situation under which no man can tell what the return of investment might be at the end of the 50-year period in the event of recapture. Therefore, in addition to all of the necessary chances that men take, they would be confronted at the end of the period with the chance of partial confiscation.

But I should not so tremendously worry about that from the viewpoint of development, because I think we would get a good deal of development even under that plan. But my interest is principally in behalf of the users of power. What about them under a plan of recapture that is uncertain and that may be confiscatory? How are the rates to be fixed under these projects? By local and State boards and commissions. On what are they to base rates and charges? First, on cost of construction, added to that the cost of operation. Are there any other elements? Aye, under the improperly called fair-value recapture clause there would be another tremendously important element. Under it the operator would say to such a commission, "In addition to the cost of construction, maintenance, and operation there is at the end of the period of 50 years the possibility and the probability of very great loss of capital invested, and we have the right to have that loss considered and provided for in the rates and charges during the 50 years. We are entitled to compensation for those losses." There is not an honest rate-fixing board in the country that would not be persuaded by that argument.

And, if they were not, the courts of the country would remind them of the fact that men facing a loss on their investment at a given date are entitled, during the running of the years, to have a rate high enough to cover not only the original cost and the cost of operation and maintenance, together with a fair return on the investment, but also high enough to compensate for the probable loss at the end of the period. And so this uncertain clause, liable to entail loss at the end of the period—nobody knows how much—would be used as a reason and excuse for raising rates. How much? Enough to cover the probable loss. Oh, we know that the case on the part of the investor would be presented with great ingenuity and force, fortified with facts and figures, and on the part of the public all too frequently in an ex parte and indifferent way, and the result would be that, in the majority of cases, the public would pay the owners many times over for the possible loss at the end of the period. I am not so much worried about the investor, though he is entitled to consideration. I am interested for and on behalf of the people who must pay the tolls, and on their behalf I think we ought to have a recapture clause certain and definite, so certain and so definite that it does not afford opportunity for a claim or an excuse for an increase or an advance of rates on the ground that the recapture clause is likely to result in partial confiscation. For these reasons and many more the recapture clause in the bill is much better than the one the gentleman proposes. It is better because it will bring larger development. It is better for the man who pays the bills because it is reasonably certain and definite. There will, of course, be losses to the investor, losses incident to the business. We are not trying to save him from those. But let there be no loss by recapture, furnishing the basis of high rates on account of claim of such loss. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have 31 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I am wondering whether there ought not to be more Members here.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want them to come here just to listen to me. I want to finish what I have to say, and then a call for a quorum can be made, so that Members may come in and vote. I am willing to talk to these good Republicans, who seem to be largely interested in this subject—interested in a proper way. They are sitting here listening to what is being said, while others are not staying here quite so well. We will give them an opportunity at least to get back to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 31 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am going into this matter a little backward in order to meet some criticisms, or attempted criticisms, for that is about all they amount to.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who is always interesting and always intelligent and always able, talks about recapture provisions. The gentleman knows, I suppose—I at least am so informed—that in France and Norway and, as far as I know, in all European countries a specific license date is given to power companies, at the end of which time the property reverts to the Crown or to the Government, without any compensation whatever for the property.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. For a question.

Mr. MONDELL. That provision has the virtue of certainty. The purchaser of the power in the meantime pays for the improvement, and he knows he is paying for it. The trouble with the gentleman's proposition is that it is uncertain. If the gentleman would propose something of that kind it would at least have the virtue of logic and certainty.

Mr. SIMS. Would the gentleman vote according to his logic?

Mr. MONDELL. I said before the gentleman's committee——

Mr. SIMS. Oh, the bill is before a greater committee than mine now—the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MONDELL. I would prefer that kind of a plan to the uncertainties of the plan here proposed.

Mr. SIMS. I am asking the gentleman a direct question: Will the gentleman vote for such an amendment if offered in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MONDELL. No; because——

Mr. SIMS. Ah, well, then, away with your advocacy of that which you will not even vote for.

Mr. MONDELL. No; but it is better than the other, because it is certain.

Mr. SIMS. But you do not want either. You do not want recapture. That is the whole truth of it. We might just as well be plain about it. You are unwilling to vote for anything that will bring about recapture.

Now, one gentleman harps a good deal upon the expression "Mr. Merrill and his associates." He said that the President had called three distinguished members of his Cabinet "Mr. Merrill's associates." Why, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] this morning explained that matter in his own time; that Mr. Merrill and certain representatives from the Department of the Interior, Mr. Finney and Mr. Brown, I believe, and Gen. Black from the War Department, had prepared the original bill, and that some phases of it they had not fully considered, and that this interdepartmental committee afterwards prepared the suggested amendments that were brought in by Mr. Merrill, accompanied by a letter signed by the three Secretaries suggesting these amendments, and they undoubtedly must have been what the President referred to when he said "associates." But the fact seems to be that there had been a kind of general association among all of them in trying to bring about the best results. That is a chinquapin criticism anyway. Then another one——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I must get through.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will admit that I have never referred to the three Secretaries as associates of Mr. Merrill.

Mr. SIMS. I admit more than that—that the President did not have them in mind and did not refer to them.

My brother ANDERSON spoke about the President being misled as to these amendments. I suppose the President is the hardest man who has been in the White House for many years to be misled about anything. He is very fully informed and knows all about these things. The only trouble was that the proposed amendments gotten up by Mr. Merrill and his associates were not submitted to him. If they had been, many of them, no doubt, would never have reached us.

But the gentleman said that I hotfooted to the White House with Mr. FERRIS's minority report. Now, the gentleman heard what I said. Could he with dignity and fairness claim that I hotfooted down there to carry that minority report? Nothing I said or that anybody else said would warrant any such statement. It shows a little sting, a little something that is not as angelic as we usually read about in books dealing with the disposition and temperament of angels. The gentleman knows——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Let me finish this part of it.

I stated emphatically, after the recess agitation came up and I saw in the papers that two Senators and Mr. KITCHIN had visited the President and consulted with him as to the recess, and that he did not object to a recess, I knew the President had been urgent in trying to have water-power legislation. I made an appointment for that purpose, and no other, after the bill had been reported. I could not get an appointment short of four days after the time I asked for it. It was made for Thursday, if I recollect. Afterwards I learned that Mr. FERRIS had an appointment two days earlier, and then I asked if the two appointments could not be consolidated, so that we could both be there at the same time. I had no motive in being there when he was there except I hoped that it would be possible that we might agree upon what was the best thing to do in order to get the water-power bill acted on by the House before we had any recess.

On the morning we were to go to the White House a messenger from Mr. FERRIS came over and brought a letter to the President, which I did not read, with the statement that the package which was given to me was a copy of his minority views which he expected to file. I have not read them to this very hour. He asked me if I would not take them and leave them with the President, as Mr. FERRIS was ill. I did so after I got through with what I had to say about the recess. I said, "Here is a letter from Mr. FERRIS, and here is what he says is a copy of his minority views." Then he made his statement to me which I have before related. I had not said one word to him touching the minority views of Mr. FERRIS.

Now, when the gentleman from Minnesota says that I "hotfooted it" to the President to carry the minority views, seeking to make the impression that I was attempting to mislead or misinform the President or to influence him to do what he has since done, he is doing that which is both unjust and untrue.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why did not the gentleman indicate when he offered the report that he dissented from the majority report?

Mr. SIMS. Because I was representing the views of the majority. We are not allowed to talk about what occurred in committee, but there is no member of the committee but that knows what my position was. Every member of the committee knew that I was bitterly opposed to the net-investment proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. I read the report and thought it was the gentleman's report, and did not know anything different.

Mr. SIMS. It is my report as chairman, and it represents the views of the committee as expressed by a majority of its members.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did not the President have the minority report in his hand before the majority report was printed? That is a fair question.

Mr. SIMS. It is a fair question. I gave the report to him, but I do not know whether he has ever read it to this day or not.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. No; I can not. There is, of course, no attempt to keep me from making my speech, but that will be the effect of it if I yield. I do not yield any further at present. Now, I want to reply to what I think ought to be given real consideration. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has been on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce longer than any Member who is now a member of that committee. He has been a very useful, a very intelligent, a very able, and a very fair member of that committee. Now, what kind of a dam law was passed while Mr. ESCH was a leading member of that committee and to which he made no dissent that I know anything about? What does it provide as to the disposition of property of the licensee? I refer to the act of 1910. Who was chairman of the committee at that time? The Hon. JAMES R. MANN, than whom this House has never had a more attentive, painstaking, or able man, not only as to that which passed through his own committee, but as to all legislation. What kind of a bill did they pass in 1910? What was in that bill? Let me read it to you. It was the general dam act of 1910, approved June 23, 1910.

Section 4 reads, in part, as follows:

And provided also, That the authority granted under or in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall terminate at the end of a period not to exceed 50 years from the date of the original approval of the project under this act, unless sooner revoked as herein provided or Congress shall otherwise direct.

Pray tell me what does the licensee get then? The property absolutely reverts to the United States under the Mann act.

Under the act passed when Mr. MANN was chairman of the committee and when Mr. ESCH, my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin, was one of the ablest members of the committee, he was in favor of a 50-year term, with actual loss of property to the licensee at the end of the term. Why did not this beautiful term of "net investment" occur to them at that time as a proper provision of that bill? There was no fair-value payment, no recapture compensation whatever. That is the law to-day. That is a Republican law, reported by a committee of a Republican House and signed by a Republican President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That was only for building dams, not to create water power, as I understand it.

Mr. SIMS. See how it reads. The gentleman has not read the act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I have it is a good while ago.

Mr. SIMS. It includes both.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would ask, also, how many dams or water-power projects were constructed under it?

Mr. SIMS. That is just what I am coming to. Gentlemen throughout the whole country who did not want any kind of recapture, who did not want any of the property to ever revert, who wanted the leases to run on forever, began a campaign immediately saying that Congress had made it impossible to develop water power. Pray tell me what Congess did? They have been lambasting Congress ever since and talking about the great amount of water power that was not developed on account of the acts of Congress of 1906 and 1910. Why did not Mr. ESCH at that time fight that bill as being unfair to the investor, and as being calculated to prevent any kind of investment? Did he think it would prevent investment? If he did, he ought to have fought it, not favored it. But he did not know that it would prevent it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In a moment. He did not know it would prevent it. He thought then, as he thinks now, that we ought to do what is best for the public interest in general, but who is responsible for the irrevocable permit touching development of public lands? This general dam act was in charge of Mr. MANN and ably seconded by Mr. STEVENS and my friend Mr. ESCH, and nobody then thought it was not in the public interest. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. Knowing that the chairman has given a great deal of study to this particular section, I want to ask for information, and information only, this question: I understand that under this recapture clause as I read it—and I desire to know whether I interpret it correctly—the Government may or may not take over the property of the licensee and it may take over all of it or it may take over part of it. In other words, it may take over that which is valuable and serviceable to the Government.

Mr. SIMS. It can take all of it or any part of it.

Mr. BLACK. I have heard it stated during the debate that the Government would have to take over worthless, dilapidated property and pay the net investment.

Mr. SIMS. If it takes it over at all, it will have to pay the net investment.

Mr. BLACK. It would not necessarily have to take over worthless, dilapidated property?

Mr. SIMS. It does not have to take it over at all. That is one of the objections to the bill urged by water-power men.

Mr. BLACK. Let me ask——

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I know the gentleman from Texas can ask many questions, and I might answer them, but if I yield to him I shall have to yield to everyone else.

Mr. BLACK. Can they take over the project without taking over the property of the concern that it has put there?

Mr. SIMS. Of course, it can take all of the project proper, as provided, and it will have to pay only for the part so taken over. Away back in 1914, when Mr. Merrill was before the Senate committee on a bill then pending for the development of water power, here is what he said—and I am reading it especially for the benefit of my friend from Washington, Mr. JOHNSON, who the other day criticized my letter, my statement, for having used the words "three secretaries," and I want him to know where I got it. This is the same Mr. Merrill, who said:

Just in closing, to answer again the question that was just presented, I think if the Federal Government has to assume such powers as are provided for in this bill, or approximately those powers, that administration can not be effected except by a commission appointed by the Federal Government, not even such a commission as has been proposed in one bill already introduced before the Senate, namely, a commission of three secretaries, because it is absolutely a physical impossibility for the Secretaries themselves to handle such matters. These are matters of technical engineering and financial and economic details which can not be satisfactorily handled, as we have had evidence times without number, except by a technical commission.

Now, that is where I got the words "three secretaries," and while he does not call them by name I must suppose he refers to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture. My friend Mr. ESCH delivers a eulogy on Secretary Lane, and I want to join with Mr. ESCH in that eulogy. I do not think there is an abler, a more useful, or a better man in public life than Secretary Lane. Shortly after he was appointed on the Interstate Commerce Commission I personally congratulated him and the country that he had been so appointed. From the day he began that service he has been worthy of the honor that was conferred upon him. Finally he was called by the President to become a member of the Cabinet, and I then told Secretary Lane that I regretted that his services on the Interstate Commerce Commission should terminate, as his services had been so valuable to the country. Once after that I said in a letter to Secretary Lane that I regretted that he was not born in the United States, so that he might some day or other occupy the highest place in the gift of the people because I thought he was entirely worthy of it. Now, I want to say no man has any higher opinion of Secretary Lane than myself. I would yield to his judgment as soon as I would to any man on any matter to which he has given attention. Now, Secretary Lane has been a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission for a number of years. He was a member of the commission when the physical-valuation law was passed. I had the honor to have charge of that bill on the floor of the House. Did Secretary Lane not know about the rules established by the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to ascertaining the physical valuation of railroads for accounting and rate-making purposes? Of course he did. Well, now, the evidence shows that when this interdepartmental committee drew up a bill it was submitted to the three Secretaries and they gave it full consideration.

That is what the hearings show. They turned it over to the President of the United States in answer, in reply, in compliance with his request to get up a bill that would result in development and at the same time protect the public interests. That bill was gotten up and delivered to the President, and after he had thoroughly considered it he then invited the members of the three committees which I have heretofore discussed, and the Rules Committee, which I have already gone over, and presented this as the finished product so far as basic principles were concerned. Now, then, the departmental committee, as told by Mr. ESCH—and I think every word is a fact; I know Mr. ESCH never states anything unless he thinks it is true, and he has a good opportunity to know so—then when they afterwards brought in a bill with some 30 proposed amendments—some of them basic and fundamental; this one of net investment was another superimposed upon it—did the Secretaries give it that thought and study after it was so amended that they did in the first bill that was gotten up and intended to be the foundation of legislation and upon which we were asked to practically scrap three committees in order to comply with request of the President? Now, I do not say what attention Secretary Houston gave it. He may have given very close attention. Mr. Merrill was an employee in his department. I am not saying this does not represent Mr. Houston's views; I do not know to the contrary, but I want to read, after Mr. ESCH, the gentleman from Wisconsin, has asked the House to consider this net-investment proposition as the mature and well-considered proposition of the three Secretaries, including Mr. Secretary Lane. Now, Mr. ANDERSON said my letter to the President left the impression that all of these proposed amendments were in the reported bill. Well, Mr. ANDERSON is very technical and very narrow in that respect. The President was not deceived, he was not misinformed, he was not misled by me as to these Merrill amendments, and he is not going to be misled by any camouflaged argument that can be made as to this matter. On the sixth page of my carbon-copy letter I said, "the committee has acted on all the amendments." That is, those proposed in the bill brought to us and as the reconsidered amended bill by Mr. Merrill.

The committee has acted on all the amendments, but the net-investment amendment is the bone of contention, and I ask you, if you are willing to do so, to let me know whether or not these proposed amendments were submitted to you and whether or not they were approved by you, especially the net-investment amendment as written in the reported bill.

Why, there is no question about it and my letter describes exactly what was done, and there is no possibility of anybody being deceived and of anybody not seeing the facts if they only have the desire to see them.

Now, let us see what Secretary Lane said about this matter. He appeared before the Water Power Committee on March 27, one month—30 days—after the letter which he had signed or which had his name signed to it. Now, on page 450 of the hearings, part 1, Mr. FERRIS asked Mr. Lane the following question:

Mr. Secretary, have you read the amendments printed in italics proposed in this last print of the bill?
Secretary LANE. Mr. Brown just called my attention to them. I had never seen the last print until I came into the committee room here.

Now, who can get up here and say that Secretary Lane had thoroughly considered and approved and indorsed these amendments?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Wait until I finish.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to correct you right there.

Mr. SIMS. I am reading from the record.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What he said was he had never seen the bill, not the amendments.

Mr. SIMS. The bill with the amendments in it, which we had right before us. That was the thing about which the letter was written. It was a transmittal letter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That had reference to the bill after it was amended.

Mr. SIMS. That is the letter that is being relied on as showing the amended bill, including the net-investment provision, was the product and perfection of reasoning of the three Secretaries after making a second effort.

What else? Right in that connection:

Mr. FERRIS. Then you have not had a chance to examine this print of the bill which shows many amendments in italics?
Secretary LANE. No; I have never seen it before.

Now, have we such faith in the mind-reading powers of the Secretary of the Interior, who said until the time he came into the committee room to be heard by the committee March 27, 1918, that he had never seen it before, and never considered a single one of the amendments? At the time Secretary Baker's name was signed to that letter Secretary Baker was in Europe.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SINNOTT. Secretary Baker was not in Europe when he appeared before the committee in favor of this net-investment amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Secretary Baker, in the same hearings, said if the committee saw proper to adopt the original provision that he had no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. He indorsed it emphatically; and the gentleman should tell the House about the letter which Secretary Lane read to the committee after that cross-examination to which you called the attention of the House.

Mr. SIMS. I have not got the letter by me, and I do not remember its exact wording, but not one question was asked Secretary Baker by way of cross-examination.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is in that same hearing. You are reading from it.

Mr. SIMS. If he wrote it, it was afterwards, of course. At this time he said he never had seen the letter to which his name was signed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That does not say that. He said he never saw the bill as amended, but he did not say at any time he never saw the amendments.

Mr. SIMS. The bill as amended.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Now, that is the trouble. The very part of the bill I wanted to discuss I have been kept away from by other discussions caused by questions.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can get some more time. I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the committee have 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I will be glad to have it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will promise to discuss these two propositions I will not object.

Mr. SIMS. That and nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes longer. Is there objection?

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the first vote is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, to strike out the net investment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee was the first to offer an amendment to the section, and therefore it seems to the Chair the amendment ought to be voted on first.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there were three or four or five amendments offered here and that they were not reported in any particular order. Does the gentleman from Tennessee wish to have his amendment voted on first?

Mr. SIMS. I do not care which one is voted on first. They have all been treated as one.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first one.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the understanding was that the amendment on page 27, striking out the definition of "net investment," would be deferred until section 14 was reached, and it would then be voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amendment that the Chair was about to order the Clerk to report to be voted upon.

Mr. RAKER. I understood the Sims amendment concerning the net investment, on page 27, was continued and passed over until we had disposed of section 14. Now, we have not disposed of section 14, and will not until we have disposed of the Ferris amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the three amendments by myself to section 14 be passed over and that the Ferris amendment be voted on in preference to my amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I object. I ask that the amendments be taken up in the order in which they appear in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments in the order of their consideration by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SIMS: Page 27, line 1, strike out all of lines 1 to 18, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMS: Page 37, line 4, after the word "license," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOREMUS—

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent it was agreed that that amendment would be deferred. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] asked it.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman from Oklahoma is mistaken. The amendment I offer perfects the text. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is a substitute in all its essential particulars, and anyway the vote would first come on the amendment which I offer perfecting the text.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me remind the gentleman from Michigan that it was suggested that his amendment be deferred by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman from Oklahoma is mistaken. He will bear in mind that there is another amendment I intended to offer in the event this pending amendment was defeated.

Mr. FERRIS. Perhaps it was another amendment I had in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan was to perfect the text, and the gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out.

Mr. FERRIS. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Let us have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOREMUS: Page 41, line 12, after the word "right," strike out the words "upon or after" and insert the words "during the continuance or upon," so that the lines as amended will read:

"SEC. 14. That upon not less than two years' notice in writing from the commission the United States shall have the right, during the continuance or upon the expiration of any license, to take over and thereafter to maintain," and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this suggestion to the Chair

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] a question.

Mr. MADDEN. We are voting.
Mr. ROWE. Regular order!
Mr. SIMS. As to the motion by Mr. FERRIS, to substitute 14 for 15, my recollection was that 15 was not read.
Mr. ESCH. It was only offered for information.
Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to strike out section 15. The amendment inadvertently says "14 and 15." My amendment is to strike out only section 14.
Mr. ESCH. It will not change it, anyway.
Mr. FERRIS. No.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks to modify his amendment so as to confine his motion to strike out to section 14 alone. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma to strike out and insert.
Mr. WALSH. I think that amendment ought to be read.
Mr. SIMS. Of course, it ought.
Mr. FERRIS. The amendment was offered last night and printed for information, but was not read. It ought to be read now.
The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be reported by the Clerk.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERRIS: Page 41, line 10, strike out section 14 and insert section 14 of original bill, which reads as follows:
"SEC. 14. That upon not less than two years' notice in writing from the commission the United States shall have the right, upon or after the expiration of any license, to take over and thereafter maintain and operate any project or projects, as defined in section 3 hereof, and covered in whole or in part by the license, or the right to take over upon mutual agreement with the licensee all property owned and held by the licensee then valuable and serviceable in the development, transmission, or distribution of power and which is then dependent for its usefulness upon the continuance of the license, together with any lock or locks or other aids to navigation constructed at the expense of the licensee, upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the fair value not to exceed actual cost of property taken, plus such reasonable severance damages, if any, as may be caused by the separation of said property from property valuable, serviceable, and dependent as above set forth, but not taken, and shall assume all contracts entered into by the licensee with the approval of the commission.
"The value of such property so taken shall be determined by agreement between the commission and the licensee, and in case they can not agree, by proceedings in equity instituted by the United States in the district court of the United States in the district within which any of such property may be located: Provided, That such fair value shall not include or be affected by the value of any lands, rights of way, or other property of the United States licensed by the commission under this act, by the license, or by good will, going value, or prospective revenues: Provided further, That the values allowed for water rights, rights of way, land, or interest in lands shall not be in excess of the actual reasonable cost thereof at the time of acquisition by the lessee."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, which has just been read by the Clerk.
The question was taken, and on a division, demanded by Mr. ESCH, there were—ayes 71, noes 83.
Mr. FERRIS. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.
Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. FERRIS and Mr. ESCH.
The committee again divided, and the tellers reported ayes 71, noes 96.
Accordingly the amendment was rejected.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] offers an amendment.
Mr. RAKER. My amendment has been disposed of by the action of the committee, except as to subsection (d).
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California ask unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment?
Mr. RAKER. The House has disposed of it. There is no need of voting on it again.
Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERRIS: On page 41, section 14, line 23, after the word "the," where it occurs the first time, insert the following: "fair value, which in no instance shall exceed the."

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order that that amendment is not in order. The House has already voted upon an amendment in the nature of a substitute covering identically the same proposition.
Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.
Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of the Whole has just decided by a clear majority that it wants to retain the net investment proposition. A good deal of the argument has been that they wanted to retain it in order to retain the accounting feature. Now, if that be the purpose—and I have no doubt it is in the minds of many—this preserves the net investment as an accounting proposition, but likewise preserves the feature that the Government at the time of the taking shall not pay in excess of the fair value, which in no instance shall exceed the net investment. So that if this amendment be agreed to, the thought of the net investment, so far as it is an accounting proposition is concerned, is preserved, but the public interest is and will be likewise preserved by providing that in no instance shall the Government, the State, the city, or the town pay more than the property is actually and fairly worth, and it does not involve the same proposition. It is really much more far-reaching than the original proposition.
Mr. ANDERSON. This is an argument on the point of order, and the gentleman is discussing the merits of it.
Mr. FERRIS. I understand that the gentleman has raised a point of order, and in fairness to myself I must discuss the facts, as that is the issue, and that is what I am doing. I am explaining that this involves an issue which is much more far-reaching than the substitute which I originally offered. If the amendment that I offered had been agreed to, the net investment feature would not have been preserved either as an accounting proposition or as a recapture proposition. In this instance the net investment is preserved as an accounting proposition, but as a recapture proposition it is modified to the extent that in no instance shall the public pay more than the property is actually worth at the time of retaking, and I ask for a vote upon my amendment. The amendment ought to be adopted. It is in the public interest. There should be no objection to it.
Mr. WALSH. The gentleman had better find out whether it is in order first.
Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, of course, the intention of the gentleman from Oklahoma has nothing to do with the determination of whether this amendment is in order or not. The situation is this: The House has voted on a substitute for the entire section and voted that substitute down. If the gentleman's amendment was in order at all, it was in order in the first place, before the vote on the substitute, as an amendment perfecting the text. The amendment is in the exact language of a part of the substitute. A vote upon it would be a vote on substantially the same proposition as the House has voted in voting on the substitute. If the gentleman's contention is correct, after we have voted the substitute down, which contains the same substantive proposition, and he can afterwards offer it as an amendment, there would never be an end to it.
The CHAIRMAN. Was the accounting provision in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma the same as in section 14 of the bill?
Mr. FERRIS. There was no accounting provision in it at all.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It seems to the Chair that these two amendments are sufficiently distinct to hold the amendment in order and give the committee a chance to vote upon it. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.
The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERRIS) there were—55 ayes and 87 noes.
So the amendment was rejected.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has an amendment pending to section 14, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 14 the following:
"Provided, That the right of the United States or any State or municipality to take over, maintain, and operate any project licensed under this act at any time by condemnation proceedings, upon payment of just compensation, is hereby expressly reserved."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.
The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 24, after the word "payment," insert the words "less depreciation and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.
The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SEARS] there were—37 ayes and 70 noes.
So the amendment was rejected.
Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be again reported.
The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out subdivision (d), section 10, being all of lines 20 to 25, page 36, and all of lines 1 to 9, page 37.
Strike out all of lines 1 to 18, both inclusive, page 27, of section 3.

Mr. RAKER. The last part of that is withdrawn.
Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will have to modify his amendment before it is offered.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent to modify it by striking out the last part, relating to the net investment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out subdivision d, section 10, being all of lines 20 to 25, page 36, and all of lines 1 to 9, page 37.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that subsection c, page 36, was passed over and not read and not acted upon, in view of the fact that it contains the net investment, and I ask that it be now read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has an amendment pending.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; we agreed to return to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 36, line 18, after the word "works," strike out the semicolon, insert a comma and the following language: "but such license shall be upon the express condition that said licensee shall make settlement or compensation for all damages to be caused by the construction of such project according to the laws of the State where such damages are to be caused before construction of such project."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, after consulting with the chairman of the committee and several Members I have changed the phraseology of the amendment, and I ask to modify my amendment accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered, and the Clerk will read the modified amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 36, line 15, after the word "property" and the period, strike out the balance of line 15 and lines 16, 17, 18, 19 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Each license issued hereunder shall contain an express condition that the licensee shall, before the commencement of the construction of said project works, comply with all laws of the State or States in which said project works or any part thereof are to be situated relative to damages that may be caused, directly or indirectly, by said proposed project works, but the United States shall not be liable for any part of said damages."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, is there no debate upon this? I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, if I may, as to his amendment, which I am in favor of. It occurred to me that he ought to strike out the words "or States." He provides that the licensee shall comply with the laws of the State or States in which the project works or any part thereof may be located. It occurs to me that he ought to strike out the words "or States," so that it would provide that the licensee shall comply with the laws of the State in which the project or any part thereof may be located. Then you would know exactly what you want there, and there might be some conflict in the laws of the States. That would require the condemnation proceedings, and so forth—damages—to proceed according to the law of the State in which the project or any part thereof might happen to be.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee agrees with me, I think perhaps the suggestion is a good one, and that the words "or States" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SIMS. All I want to do is to effect what the gentleman desires. I think the suggestion is a proper one.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to further modify the amendment by striking out the words "or States" where they occur.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer at this time an amendment that may be pending and printed in the RECORD for the information of the committee. I do not desire to have it read at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment, to be printed in the RECORD, to be considered pending, for the information of the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. The same is to be considered pending?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; I so stated.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve all points of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota reserves points of order. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Michigan desires to have the amendment read now.

Mr. DOREMUS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD for the information of the committee.

There was no objection.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Mr. DOREMUS moves to amend by striking out everything in the bill after section 2, on page 24, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That the words defined in this section shall have the following meanings when found in this act, to wit:

"'Public lands' means such lands and interest in lands owned by the United States as are subject to private appropriation and disposal under public-land laws. It shall not include 'reservations,' as hereafter defined.

"'Reservations' means lands and interest in lands owned by the United States and withdrawn, reserved, or withheld from private appropriation and disposal under the public-land laws, and lands and interest in lands acquired and held for any public purpose.

"'State' means a State admitted to the Union, the District of Columbia, and any organized Territory of the United States.

"'Municipality' means a city, county, irrigation district, drainage district, or other political subdivision of a State, competent under the laws thereof to carry on the business of developing, transmitting, utilizing, or distributing power.

"'Municipal purposes' means and includes all purposes within municipal powers as defined by the constitution or laws of the State or by the charter of the municipality.

"'Navigation dam' means a dam or other work, constructed or owned by the United States for the improvement of navigation, with or without contribution from others, from which flows surplus water not needed for navigation that may be disposed of under the provisions of this act.

"'Project' means a complete unit of improvement or development, consisting of a power house, all water conduits, all dams and appurtenant works and structures (including navigation structures) which are a part of said unit, and all storage, diverting, or forebay reservoirs directly connected therewith, the primary line or lines transmitting power therefrom to the point of junction with the distribution system or with the interconnected primary transmission system, all miscellaneous structures used and useful in connection with said unit or any part thereof, and all water rights, rights of way, ditches, dams, reservoirs, lands, or interest in lands, the use and occupancy of which are necessary or appropriate in the maintenance and operation of such unit.

"'Project work' means the physical structures of a project.

"SEC. 4. That the commission is hereby authorized and empowered—

"(a) To make investigations and to collect and record data concerning the power industry and its relation to other industries and to interstate or foreign commerce, and concerning the location, capacity, development costs, and relation to markets of power sites, and whether the power from navigation dams can be advantageously used by the United States for its public purposes, and what is a fair value of such power, to the extent it may deem necessary or useful for the purposes of this act.

"(b) To cooperate with the executive departments and other agencies of the Government in such investigations; and for such purpose the several departments and agencies are authorized and directed, upon the request of the commission, to furnish such records, papers, and information in their possession as may be requested by the commission, and temporarily to detail to the commission such officers or experts as may be necessary in such investigations.

"(c) To make public from time to time such portions of the information secured hereunder as it shall deem expedient in the public interest, and to provide for the publication of its reports and investigations in such form and manner as may be best adapted for public information and use.

"(d) To prepare a comprehensive plan for the construction, operation, and maintenance by the Government of the United States, in accordance with appropriations to be made and authority to be conferred by Congress, of dams, powerhouses, and other project works necessary or proper for the development and improvement of navigation upon, along, across, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, or upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States (including Territories) and for the purpose of utilizing in the public interest the surplus water or water power from any navigation dam now or hereafter constructed.

"(e) To issue licenses to any State or municipality for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, or other project works necessary or convenient for the development and improvement of navigation, and for the development, transmission, and utilization of power across, along, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, or upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States (including the Territories), or for the purpose of utilizing the surplus water or water power from any navigation dam, except as herein provided: Provided, That licenses shall be issued within any reservation only after a finding by the commission that the license will not interfere or be inconsistent with the purpose for which such reservation was created or acquired, and shall be subject to and contain such conditions as the Secretary of the department under whose supervision such reservation falls shall deem necessary for the adequate protection and utilization of such reservation: Provided further, That no license affecting the navigable capacity of any navigable waters of the United States shall be issued until the plans of the dam and other navigation structures have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. Whenever the contemplated improvement is, in the judgment of the commission, desirable and justified in the public interest for the purpose of improving or developing a waterway or waterways for the use or benefit of interstate or foreign commerce, a finding to that effect shall be made by the commission and shall become a part of the records of the commission: Provided further, That in case the commission shall find that any navigation dam may be advantageously used by the United States for its public purposes, no license therefor shall be issued until two years after it shall have reported to Congress the facts and conditions relating thereto.

"(f) To issue preliminary permits for the purpose of enabling applicants for a license hereunder to secure the data and to perform the acts required by section 9 hereof.

"(g) To prescribe rules and regulations for the establishment of a system of accounts and for the maintenance thereof by licensees hereunder, and by the Government of the United States; to examine all books and accounts of such licensees at any time; to require them to submit at such time or times as the commission may require statements and reports, including full information as to assets and liabilities, capitalization, cost of project, cost of operation, and the production, transmission, use, and sale of power; and to make adequate provision for currently determining said costs. All such statements and report shall be made upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and on such blanks as the commission may require.

"(h) To hold hearings and to order testimony to be taken by deposition at any designated place in connection with the issuance of any permit or license, or the regulation of rates, service, or securities, or the making of any investigation, as provided in this act; and to require by subpœna, signed by any member of the commission, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence from any place in the United States, and in case of disobedience to a subpœna the commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence. Any member, expert, or examiner of the commission may, when duly designated by the commission for such purposes, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence. Depositions may be taken before any person designated by the commission and empowered to administer oaths, shall be reduced to writing by such person or under his direction, and subscribed by the deponent. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

"(i) To perform any and all acts, to make such rules and regulations, and to issue such orders not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 5. That each preliminary permit issued under this act shall be for the sole purpose of maintaining priority of application for a license under the terms of this act for such period or periods, not exceeding a total of three years, as in the discretion of the commission may be necessary for making examinations and surveys, for preparing maps, plans, specifications, and estimates, and for making financial arrangements. Each such permit shall set forth the conditions under which priority shall be maintained and a license issued. Such permits shall not be transferable, and may be canceled by order of the commission upon failure of permittees to comply with the conditions thereof.

"SEC. 6. That licenses under this act shall be issued for a period not exceeding 50 years. Each such license shall be conditioned upon acceptance by the licensee of all the terms and conditions of this act and such further conditions, if any, as the commission shall prescribe in conformity with this act, which said terms and conditions and the acceptance thereof shall be expressed in said license. Licenses may be revoked only for the reasons and in the manner prescribed under the provisions of this act, and may be altered only upon mutual agreement between the licensee and the commission after public notice given for 90 days.

"SEC. 7. That whenever, in the judgment of the commission, the development of any project should be undertaken by the United States itself, the commission shall not approve any application for such project by any State or municipality, but shall cause to be made such examinations, surveys, reports, plans, and estimates of cost of the project as it may deem necessary, and shall submit its findings to Congress with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate concerning the construction of such project by the United States.

"SEC. 8. That each applicant for a license hereunder shall submit to the commission—

"(a) Such maps, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost as may be required for a full understanding thereof. Such maps, plans, and specifications when approved by the commission shall be made a part of the license; and thereafter no change shall be made in said maps, plans, or specifications until such changes shall have been approved and made a part of such license by the commission.

"(b) Satisfactory evidence that the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State or States within which the proposed project is to be located with respect to the appropriation, diversion, and use of water for power purposes and with respect to the right to engage in the business of developing, transmitting, and distributing power, and in any other business necessary to effect the purposes of a license under this act.

"(c) Such additional information as the commission may require.

"SEC. 9. That all licenses issued under this act shall be on the following conditions:

"(a) That the project adopted, including the maps, plans, and specifications, shall be such as in the judgment of the commission will be best adapted to a comprehensive scheme of improvement and utilization for the purposes of navigation, of water-power development, irrigation, and of other beneficial public uses; and if necessary in order to secure such scheme, the commission shall have authority to require the modification of any project and of the plans and specifications of the project works before approval.

"(b) That except when emergency shall require for the protection of navigation, life, health, or property, no substantial alteration or addition not in conformity with the approved plans shall be made to any dam or other project works constructed hereunder of a capacity in excess of 100 horsepower without the prior approval of the commission; and any emergency alteration or addition so made shall thereafter be subject to such modification and change as the commission may direct.

"(c) That the licensee shall maintain the project works in a condition of repair adequate for the purposes of navigation and for the efficient operation of said works in the development and transmission of power, shall make all necessary renewals and replacements, shall maintain adequate depreciation reserves for such purposes, shall so maintain and operate said works as not to impair navigation, and shall conform to such rules and regulations as the commission may from time to time prescribe for the protection of life, health, and property. No license hereunder shall have the effect of relieving the licensee from liability for any injury or damage occasioned by the construction, maintenance, or operation of said project works; and the United States shall in no event be liable therefor.

"(d) That out of surplus earnings the licensee shall establish and maintain amortization reserves sufficient to retire any bonds or other securities issued for the construction of any project not later than 50 years from the date of issue.

"(e) That licenses for the development, transmission, or distribution of power shall be issued and enjoyed without charge: Provided, That when licenses are issued that contemplate the use of navigation dams or other structures owned by the United States, the licensee shall pay an annual charge, to be fixed by the commission, which shall not exceed in any case the fair value of the use, as nearly as the same may be ascertained.

"(f) Such further conditions not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as the commission may require.

"SEC. 10. That if the dam or other project works are to be constructed across, along, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, the commission may, in so far as it deems the same reasonably necessary to promote the present and future needs of navigation and consistent with a reasonable investment cost to the licensee, include in the license any one or more of the following provisions or requirements:

"(a) That such licensee shall, to the extent necessary to preserve and improve navigation facilities, construct in whole or in part, without expense to the United States, in connection with such dam, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or other structures for navigation purposes, in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War and made part of such license.

"(b) That in case such structures for navigation purposes are not made a part of the original construction at the expense of the licensee, then, whenever the United States shall desire to complete such navigation facilities the licensee shall convey to the United States, free of cost, such of its land and its rights of way and such right of passage through its dams or other structures, and permit such control of pools as may be required to complete such navigation facilities.

"(c) That such licensee shall furnish free of cost to the United States power for the operation of such navigation facilities, whether constructed by the licensee or by the United States.

"SEC. 11. That whenever application is filed for a project hereunder involving navigable waters of the United States, and the commission shall find upon investigation that the needs of navigation require the construction of a lock or locks or other navigation structures, and that such structures can not, consistent with a reasonable investment cost to the applicant, be provided in the manner specified in section 10, subsection (a) hereof, the commission may, either before or after taking action upon such application, cause a report upon such project to be prepared, with estimates of cost of the power development and of the navigation structures, and shall submit such report to Congress with such recommendations as it deems appropriate concerning the participation of the United States in the cost of construction of such navigation structures.

"SEC. 12. That the licensee shall commence the construction of the project works within the time fixed in the license, shall thereafter in good faith and with due diligence prosecute such construction, and shall within the time fixed in the license complete and put into operation such part of the ultimate development as the commission shall deem necessary to supply the reasonable needs of the then available market, and shall from time to time thereafter construct such portion of the balance of such development as the commission may direct, so as to supply adequately the reasonable market demands until such development shall have been completed. The periods for the commencement and completion of construction may be extended by the commission when not incompatible with the public interests. In case the licensee shall not commence actual construction of the project works, or of any specified part thereof, within the time prescribed in the license or as extended by the commission, then, after due notice given, the license shall, as to such project works or part thereof, be terminated upon written order of the commission. In case the construction of the project works, or of any specified part thereof, have been begun but not completed within the time prescribed in the license, or as extended by the commission, then the Attorney General, upon the request of the commission, shall institute proceedings in equity in the district court of the United States for the district in which any part of the project is situated for the revocation of said license, the sale of the works constructed, and such other equitable relief as the case may demand, as provided for in section 26 hereof.

"SEC. 13. That when in the opinion of the President of the United States, evidenced by a written order addressed to the holder of any license hereunder, the safety of the United States demands it, the United States shall have the right to enter upon and take possession of any project, or part thereof, constructed, maintained, or operated under said license, for the purpose of manufacturing nitrates, explosives, or munitions of war, or for any other purpose involving the safety of the United States, to retain possession, management, and control thereof for such length of time as may appear to the President to be necessary to accomplish said purposes, and then to restore possession and control to the party or parties entitled thereto; and in the event that the United States shall exercise such right, it shall pay to the party or parties entitled thereto just and fair compensation for the use of said property as may be fixed by the commission upon the basis of a reasonable profit in time of peace, and the cost of restoring said property to as good condition as existed at the time of the taking over thereof, less the reasonable value of any improvements that may be made thereto by the United States and which are valuable and serviceable to the licensee.

"SEC. 14. That the operation of any navigation facilities which may be constructed as a part of, or in connection with any dam or diversion structure built under the provisions of this act, whether at the expense of a licensee hereunder or of the United States, shall at all times be controlled by such reasonable rules and regulations in the interest of navigation, including the control of the level of the pool caused by such dam or diversion structure, may be made from time to time by the Secretary of War. Such rules and regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such licensee at its own expense of such lights and signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War, and such fishways as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce.

"SEC. 15. That as a condition of the license, every licensee hereunder owning or operating any project and developing, transmitting, or distributing power for sale or use in public service shall abide by such reasonable regulation of the services to be rendered to customers or consumers of power, and of rates and charges of payment therefor, as may from time to time be prescribed by any duly constituted agency of the State in which the service is rendered or the rate charged. That in case of the development, transmission, or distribution, or use in public service of power by any licensee hereunder or by its consumer engaged in public service within a State which has not provided a commission or other authority with power to regulate and control the services to be rendered by such licensee or by its consumer engaged in public service, or the rates and charges of payment therefor, or the amount or character of securities to be issued by any of said parties, it is agreed as a condition of such license that jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the commission, upon complaint of any person aggrieved or upon its own initiative, to exercise such regulation and control until such time as the State shall have provided a commission or other authority for such regulation and control: Provided,

That the jurisdiction of the commission shall cease and determine as to each specific matter of regulation and control prescribed in this section as soon as the State shall have provided a commission or other authority for the regulation and control of that specific matter.

"SEC. 16. That when said power or any part thereof shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce the rates charged and the service rendered by any such licensee or by any municipality purchasing power from such licensee for sale and distribution or use in public service shall be reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and just to the consumer, and all unreasonable, discriminatory, and unjust rates or services are hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful; and whenever any of the States directly concerned has not provided a commission or other authority to enforce the requirements of this section within such State, or to regulate and control the amount and character of securities to be issued by any of such parties or such States are unable to agree through their properly constituted authorities on the services to be rendered or on the rates or charges of payment therefor, or on the amount or character of securities to be issued by any of said parties, jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the commission, upon complaint of any person aggrieved, upon the request of any State concerned, or upon its own initiative to enforce the provisions of this section, to regulate and control so much of the services rendered, and of the rates and charges of payment therefor as constitute interstate or foreign commerce and to regulate the issuance of securities by the parties included within this section.

"The administration of the provisions of this section, so far as applicable, shall be according to the procedure and practice in fixing and regulating the rates, charges, and practices of railroad companies as provided in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and that the parties subject to such regulation shall have the same rights of hearing, defense, and review as said companies in such cases.

"SEC. 17. That when the grantee can not acquire by contract or pledges the right to use or damage the lands or property of others necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any dam, reservoir, diversion structure, or the works appurtenant or accessory thereto, it may acquire the same by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located, or in the State courts.

"SEC. 18. That whenever the public interests requires or justifies the execution by the licensee of contracts for the sale and delivery of power for periods extending beyond the date of termination of the license, such contracts may be entered into upon the joint approval of the commission and of the public-service commission or other similar authority in the State in which the sale or delivery of power is made, or if sold or delivered in a State which has no such public-service commission, then upon the approval of the commission, and thereafter in the event of failure to issue a new license to the original licensee at the termination of the license, the United States shall assume and fulfill all such contracts.

"SEC. 19. That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking any permit or valid existing right of way heretofore granted, or as revoking any authority heretofore given pursuant to law, but any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality holding or possessing such permit, right of way, or authority may retain the same, subject to the conditions set forth in the grant thereof and subject to any and all rules and regulations applicable thereto and existing at the date of the approval of this act.

"SEC. 20. That any lands of the United States included in any proposed project under the provisions of this act shall from the date of filing of application therefor be reserved from entry, location, or other disposal under the laws of the United States until otherwise directed by the commission or by Congress. Notice that such application has been made, together with the date of filing thereof and a description of the lands of the United States affected thereby, shall be filed in the local land office for the district in which such lands are located. Whenever the commission shall determine that the value of any lands of the United States so applied for, or heretofore or hereafter reserved or classified as power sites, will not be injured or destroyed for the purposes of power development by location, entry, or selection under the public-land laws, the Secretary of the Interior, upon notice of such determination, shall declare such lands open to location, entry, or selection, subject to and with a reservation of the right of the United States or its permittees or licensees to enter upon, occupy, and use any part or all of said lands necessary, in the judgment of the commission, for the purposes of this act, which right shall be expressly reserved in every patent issued for such lands; and no claim or right to compensation shall accrue from the occupation or use of any of said lands for said purposes. The United States or any licensee for any such lands hereunder may enter thereupon for the purposes of this act upon payment of any damages to crops, buildings, or other improvements caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond to the United States for the use and benefit of the owner to secure the payment of such damages as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond in a court of competent jurisdiction, said bond to be in the form prescribed by the commission: Provided, That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore made for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section contained.

"SEC. 21. That the Attorney General may, on request of the commission or of the Secretary of War, institute proceedings in equity in the district court of the United States in the district in which any project or part thereof is situated for the purpose of revoking for violation of its terms any license issued hereunder, or for the purpose of remedying or correcting by injunction, mandamus, or other process any act of commission or omission in violation of the provisions of this act or of any lawful regulation or order promulgated hereunder. The district courts shall have jurisdiction over all of the above-mentioned proceedings and shall have power to issue and execute all necessary process and to make and enforce all writs, orders, and decrees to compel compliance with the lawful orders and regulations of the commission and of the Secretary of War, and to compel the performance of any condition imposed under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 22. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses, or any vested right acquired therein, or with the police regulations of the respective States.

"SEC. 23. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; but no such alteration, amendment, or repeal shall affect any license theretofore issued under the provisions of this act, or the rights of any licensee thereunder.

"SEC. 24 That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to modify or repeal any of the provisions of the act of Congress approved December 19, 1913, granting certain rights of way to the city and county of San Francisco."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that we now read section 15.

Mr. SIMS. I was just about to ask that identical thing.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Last night just before adjournment there was an amendment offered striking out, on page 37, line 24, the rest of that paragraph, beginning with the words "but in no case," and so forth, and the chairman asked that that be passed over until he could consider it.

Mr. SIMS. It has not yet been disposed of, and I have not had time to look into the matter.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Very well; I just wanted to have it understood that it was still in order to revert to that at any time before the bill is finally disposed of.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That when in the opinion of the President of the United States, evidenced by a written order addressed to the holder of any license hereunder, the safety of the United States demands it, the United States shall have the right to enter upon and take possession of any project, or part thereof, constructed, maintained, or operated under said license, for the purpose of manufacturing nitrates, explosives, or munitions of war, or for any other purpose involving the safety of the United States, to retain possession, management, and control thereof for such length of time as may appear to the President to be necessary to accomplish said purposes, and then to restore possession and control to the party or parties entitled thereto; and in the event that the United States shall exercise such right, it shall pay to the party or parties entitled thereto just and fair compensation for the use of said property as may be fixed by the commission upon the basis of a reasonable profit in time of peace, and the cost of restoring said property to as good condition as existed at the time of the taking over thereof, less the reasonable value of any improvements that may be made thereto by the United States and which are valuable and serviceable to the licensee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman will permit, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

PRINTING REVENUE BILL (H. DOC. NO. 1267).

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, there is a House resolution on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments, and I ask the Speaker to lay it before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following House resolution with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 51.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 25,000 copies of H. R. 12863, entitled "A bill to provide revenue, and for other purposes," together with the report No. 767 upon the same, as a House document, 2,000 copies to go to the document room of the House of Representatives, 21,750 copies to the folding room of the House of Representatives, and 1,250 copies to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that there be printed 10,000 as a Senate document for the use of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 2, strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-seven"; line 9, strike out the words "as a Senate document"; line 10, after the word "Senate," insert "and 2,000 copies for the Committee on Finance."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the effect of the amendment of the Senate is to increase the number of the bills to be printed by 2,000, those 2,000 to be given to the Finance Committee of the Senate. As the resolution originally passed the House it provided for 10,000 copies of the revenue bill to be printed as a Senate document for the use of the Senate. Of course it was an error to have that in the resolution, and the Senate amended it by striking out "as a Senate document," which allows the bill to be printed as a House bill, as it should be printed, with 10,000 for the use of the Senate. So the only effect of these amendments is to increase the number by 2,000 for the use of the Finance Committee of the Senate and to strike out the provision in the resolution providing that 10,000 copies of the House bill be printed as a Senate document. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how many people are as blind as I am, but the printing that is done in the report and, I think, in the bill is jammed up so you can not see it without a magnifying glass—and I see fairly well; can read without glasses—and it makes it almost impossible to follow the report. Could it not be printed in larger type? How much more money will it cost?

Mr. GILLETT. It is as good type as the newspapers which we all read.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, we do not all read them. It is poor paper, and in a bill that is to raise $10,000,000,000 the country at large, and especially the Members of the House, ought to be able to read it without magnifying glasses.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield? The 25,000 copies are to be put in the folding room and distributed among the Members proportionately, about 50 to each Member?

Mr. CRISP. Yes; the distribution is in no wise changed from the original resolution passed by the House. The only changes are those I mentioned, and the only reason I asked the Speaker to lay it before the House and move to concur in these amendments now is that there are no copies in the document room, and Members trying to obtain copies of the bill can not get them. The bill is to come up on Friday, and many Members of the House are extremely anxious to obtain a copy of the bill and report. The secretary of the chairman of the committee came to me and said that Mr. KITCHIN was at home and asked me to call up the resolution and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. NORTON. The bill should be printed.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman ought to suggest in connection with the request of the gentleman that only 15,000 are to be distributed in the folding room. Of the 37,000 in all, 2,000 are for the Senate Finance Committee, 1,250 for the Committee on Ways and Means, 10,000 for distribution by the Senate, and 15,000 through the folding room of the House.

Mr. CRISP. I think the gentleman is in error. My recollection of it is that 21,750 are to go through the folding room.

Mr. GARNER. That may be correct.

Mr. CRISP. One thousand and fifty through the document room, and then there are 10,000 in addition to this 25,000 for the use of the Senate. The Senate adds another 2,000 for the Senate to go to the Finance Committee.

Mr. WALSH. Will not the bill be printed in the usual bill form for consideration in the House?

Mr. CRISP. Absolutely. This simply provides that this number of the bill and report shall be printed.

Mr. CANNON. I want to know, before that happens, if we can not have this report and the bill printed upon good paper, in type that somebody can read without a magnifying glass?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will yield, what is the difference between the copies we are providing now and the regular copies?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think there is any difference.

Mr. CANNON. There is the report. Look at the tables.

Mr. CRISP. Answering the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I would like to state that my understanding is that this bill and report are to be printed on the usual paper and in the usual type in which all bills and reports are printed.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe it was understood yesterday between the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] that if printed in a different type it would cost less money and take less paper, and that it was agreed it should be printed in that different type. That is my understanding.

Mr. CRISP. I knew nothing of that agreement. The resolution as now before the House contains no such provision. It simply provides for the printing of 37,000 copies of this bill and report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The Speaker announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 936. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Bozeman, Mont., certain land for alley purposes; and

S. 934. An act authorizing the State of Montana to select other lands in lieu of lands in section 16, township 2 north, range 30 east, within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project and the ceded portion of Crow Indian Reservation in said State.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the war and partisanship. I make this request at this time because it was my intention to make this speech next week, during the consideration of the tax bill under general debate, but by reason of the leave of absence which is granted me by reason of a death in my family, I shall not be here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing my own speech on the subject of the war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the war. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, September 5, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting copy of the report of the commission in valuation docket No. 5, Winston-Salem Southbound Railway Co. (H. Doc. No. 1268); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communication from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Steamboat-Inspection Service for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1269); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12844) for the relief of John Minahan, alias John Bagley, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 769), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 12870) providing for the substitution of the single-rail system as applied by the Boynton railway patents to the standard roads; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LAZARO: A bill (H. R. 12871) to prevent the injury, damage, destruction, or impairment of use of locks or locks and dam constructed in a navigable stream or canal by the United States Government or constructed by a private person, company, or corporation, by and with the consent of Congress, and to punish and prevent such offenses; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 12872) making certain officers of the Army eligible for appointment as Chief of Staff Corps and departments; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALTON: A bill (H. R. 12873) granting the public lands within the State of New Mexico to said State; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BANKHEAD: A bill (H. R. 12880) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. BURNETT: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 326) authorizing the readmission to the United States of lawfully resident aliens applying therefor after having been enlisted or conscripted for military service of the United States or of one of the nations cobelligerents of the United States; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 12874) granting a pension to Lebbeus H. Brockway; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12875) granting a pension to Adoniram J. Edwards; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12876) granting a pension to Thomas Casey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SANDERS of New York: A bill (H. R. 12877) granting a pension to Edgar Shadbolt; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALTON: A bill (H. R. 12878) fixing the term of service of Welton W. Pratt during the Civil War; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12879) fixing the term of service of Elijah C. Putman during the Civil War; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ESCH: Petition of A. J. Johnson, president Iowa State Equity Society; H. A. Fuller, vice president American Society of Equity; J. Weller Long, secretary-treasurer American Society of Equity; and S. W. Ricords, president South Dakota Farmers' Union, asking for the suspension of immigration laws that sufficient farm labor may be secured during the war; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HERSEY (by request): Petition of Waterville Motor Co. and other citizens of Waterville, Me., urging change in taxation of automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petition of William W. Castleberry, Los Angeles, Cal., urging war-time prohibition for conservation of grains, etc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolution of Rev. Marcus P. McClure and others of First Presbyterian Church, Los Angeles, Cal., urging prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 5, 1918.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, September 4, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Martin	Sterling
Benet	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Sutherland
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	New	Thomas
Calder	Kellogg	Overman	Townsend
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Penrose	Trammell
Culberson	Kenyon	Phelan	Vardaman
Curtis	King	Poindexter	Warren
Fletcher	Kirby	Shafroth	Watson
France	Knox	Sheppard	Wilfley
Gore	Lenroot	Simmons
Hale	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Henderson	McNary	Smoot

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is necessarily absent temporarily. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. GORE. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is absent on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. PHELAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. NORRIS and Mr. FALL answered to their names when called.

Mr. POMERENE, Mr. GUION, Mr. NUGENT, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. MCKELLAR entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

TRANSFER OF GOVERNMENT BUREAUS FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution which I ask the Secretary to read, and that it may lie over until the unfinished business is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 296) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, under the powers conferred upon him by the provisions of the so-called Overman Act, and for the purpose of relieving the congestion of population in the District of Columbia, to order the transfer from Washington to other cities in the country for the duration of the war, all bureaus, commissions, and subdivisions of the several departments which can discharge their functions and perform their duties as well outside of said district as within its boundaries, such order to be effective not later than the 1st day of October, A. D. 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table subject to call.

DRY ZONE AROUND MUNITION PLANTS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution and have the same immediately considered. In the agricultural bill there has been adopted a clause or paragraph authorizing the President to establish what is called a dry zone around munition plants, shipbuilding yards, and so forth. As that bill may not become a law for a month or two months I would like to have the Senate pass this joint resolution, as it is very important that the President shall have that power now. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this joint resolution, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall have to object to the joint resolution at this time. It emphasizes the necessity of the passage of the pending agricultural bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

ARREST OF ALLEGED SLACKERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I know it is hardly in order at this time to address the Senate on any subject except the pending unfinished business, but I ask to have read into the RECORD an editorial from the New York World of this morning, entitled "New York's Dragonade." It is very short, and after it is read I desire to make just a few observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the article will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK'S DRAGONADE.

Whoever was responsible for the wholesale round-up of so-called draft slackers in this vicinity on Tuesday operated absolutely in defiance of the spirit of American law. He was armed with no warrants. His orders were carried out chiefly by men destitute of official standing. There is no record in all the history of New York of such another lawless proceeding.

To seize tens of thousands of young men by force in this fashion and make them prisoners on the mere suspicion that they were military delinquents was an outrage. There had been no adequate warning of the raid, which might easily have been given. No provision had been made for the care of the captives. The guilty and the innocent, the strong and the weak, the law-abiding and the law-defying, were herded together promiscuously in armories and police stations, and private citizens, usurping judicial functions, passed judgment upon droves of free-born Americans, kidnapped and insulted.

In this monstrous invasion of human rights it is noticeable that agents of the Department of Justice, deputy United States marshals, officers of the police, regular soldiers from Forts Jay and Hancock, naval bluejackets, and members of the National Guard, to say nothing of volunteer organizations, participated. By whose orders were all these forces turned loose, and by what authority did such a mob assume to act when it took captive thousands of men who, as Mr. De Woody, chief of the New York division of the Department of Justice, now admits, were not properly subject to suspicion?

In war or in peace, the arrest and incarceration of 50,000 men in order to apprehend 500 offenders is a shameful abuse of power.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if the World were not just as I am, the friend and supporter of the administration generally, I assume I would be very severely criticized for having that matter read into the RECORD. I know nothing about what is being done except what the World states, and I want to unite with the editor in denouncing any such proceedings as are now being indulged in, if the statements are true, in reference to so-called slackers, no matter from whence the authority for such proceedings comes.

Mr. President, there is no man in the Senate and there is no man in the country who despises a man who undertakes to evade his military duty any more than I do. But, notwithstanding that, Mr. President, the men who are slacking, and that there are some there can be no question, ought to be reached by due process of law. The whole Department of Justice, the Military Bureau of the War Department, the Military Bureau of the Navy Department, all the American defense societies, United States marshals, and all the officers of the law have some means and some instrumentalities for reaching the slackers. Here it is charged that thousands and tens of thousands of perfectly innocent men are being arrested without authority and haled before the courts and some of them placed in prison, possibly kept overnight there, who were perfectly innocent of undertaking to evade military duty.

I am just informed this morning by a Member of the Senate that over in Maryland in a plant where shells are being manufactured the young men who are engaged in that industry and who have been exempted because they are engaged in an essential industry when they dare go on the street are arrested by some fellow without authority and imprisoned, and immediately placed in the category of discredited slackers. That is not right; it ought not to be that young men who, against their own wishes and against their protest, are being held from active military service abroad because engaged in essential industry are looked upon as slackers, and they will not remain in their places unless compelled to do so by some military source. The result of this kind of proceeding is that young men who are innocent, who are not undertaking to slack, who are trying to do their duty by the country, are in many instances rounded up and put in prison.

I do not know by whose authority it is done, and I want to take this first opportunity to say the country will not stand it to have innocent young men rounded up and imprisoned where they have undertaken to do their whole duty to the country.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am very glad the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has brought this matter to the attention of the Senate. I was an observer of some of these raids myself on Tuesday in New York City. I protested to the officers in command of some of these squads against the manner in which the raids were being done. When I arrived in Washington yesterday morning I protested at the Department of Justice, the newspapers having indicated that they were responsible for it. The Assistant Attorney General, with whom I talked yesterday, said the matter was without his knowledge and would have his immediate attention.

But, Mr. President, I know thousands of men in New York City, many of them over the draft ages, who could have no card of classification, were taken by the authorities and sent to police stations and herded together in school yards and armories, and were compelled to have responsible people come and identify them. In fact, at least a dozen of these cases were called to my attention for identification.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator be kind enough to state when he protested to the officers in command of the squads, who were thus violating the law, what reply the officers gave and whether they stated their authority for the action taken?

Mr. CALDER. They said under the authority of the Department of Justice.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator repeat under what authority?

Mr. CALDER. Of the Department of Justice. In one place I saw a street car stopped and an armed sailor go into the car and take men out of it, in some cases where they were escorting ladies. Men were stopped in the street. They were taken out of their places of business and crowded into vans, perhaps 50 or 60 packed in like sardines, and sent to the police station houses.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator say, of his own knowledge, that any great number of persons were arrested who had registered as they ought to have registered?

Mr. CALDER. All of the men who had their registration cards with them were immediately released; but many of them, not having previous notice, did not have their cards with them; some men who were over the draft age and some under were apprehended, and not having identification cards were compelled to furnish evidence that they were not liable for service.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, the Senator would naturally look for errors in the matter of age; but, on the whole, did they not round up an enormous number of real slackers who ought to have been rounded up?

Mr. CALDER. The newspapers indicate that out of some 40,000 men who were arrested in the several boroughs of the city perhaps two or three hundred at the most were unable finally to submit satisfactory evidence that they were not liable to arrest. Many of these men, however, were not residents of New York City, but were passing through the city. One man called me up on the telephone who was a resident of Baltimore and asked me if I could identify him because of his business acquaintance in New York. I was unable to identify him, but suggested how he might be released.

Mr. THOMAS. If I understand the Senator from New York, then, the number of slackers actually apprehended was less than 1 per cent of the number arrested?

Mr. CALDER. From the newspaper stories I should judge that to be the case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of the remark of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] as to whether or not in point of fact the men arrested were slackers, I desire to say that in my opinion that is entirely irrelevant to the question that we are discussing. The question is not whether or not a man is a slacker; the question is whether the man who presumes to arrest him has any authority to arrest anybody.

Mr. CALDER. I have no further knowledge of the subject except what I was informed by a number of men who were arrested and what I read in the newspapers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. CALDER. I yield the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to say that I will withdraw my objection to the request to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business for the consideration of the joint resolution which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] desires to present.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. JOHNSON of California addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I wanted to address myself to the matter which has just been adverted to rather than to the pending measure.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to observe that I am glad the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has had this editorial read into the RECORD. I wish to say that such an editorial coming from the New York World, the unrivaled and undoubted champion of this administration, ought to be a source of gratification to every American citizen who loves the liberties which have been transmitted to us by our forefathers and who desires to see them preserved and transmitted to posterity. This editorial has in it the clarion tone of seventy-six; it is a rift in the clouds. I doubt not now that behind the clouds which have been lowering and threatening the sun is still shining. I doubt not that it is shining with undiminished splendor. I have no doubt that the rights and liberties of the American people will be vindicated and will not be destroyed. I have some slight hope also that those of us who have been subjected or who have subjected ourselves to a floodtide of abuse for no other offense than that committed by the editor of the New York World may yet find our vindication.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I wish, first, Mr. President, to congratulate the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] upon bringing this matter, most important in the preservation of the liberty of our citizens and in the preservation of our home democracy, to the attention of the Senate. I came here this morning with the description of what transpired in New York, clipped from the same paper, the editorial from which has been read at the desk. I intended to read this description without saying whence it came nor to what particular part of the world it related. As I read it I wanted to ask the Senate of the United States where it was that such a thing occurred. No Senator, without the earmarks of identification, would for an instant have said that it was in the United States of America, in the foremost democracy of the world.

Mr. President, that the Senate may know just what this particular proceeding portends, that it may understand that finally into our life has come the law of "suspects," translated from the law, indeed, of the little lawyer of Arras, promulgated 125 years ago, during the French Revolution; the law by which every man suspected by an extrajudicial organization or by some voluntary aggregation of individuals was forthwith thrown into prison then, and under its application in our country to-day into what the New York newspapers designate as the "bull pen." That we may understand fully the situation let me read you the account published in the New York World of yesterday. I am sorry that I had to disclose the identity of the article and the particular place of this occurrence, for unless it had been disclosed no man would have said it was possible in our country.

The headlines read:

Seize 30,000 in round-up after Uncle Sam spreads draft net about city.

And then this subheadline follows:

But of these only about 1,000 turn out to be probable slackers, and careless but innocent ones are freed. Exciting day at railway stations.

And I may supplement what was said by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] by adding that the official under whom these peculiar proceedings were had stated publicly in interviews that a very small percentage of the number of men confined in the "bull pen" were indeed guilty of the offense of which they were "suspected." Now follows the article:

More than 30,000 men were taken into custody yesterday at the inception of the draft round-up—the most gigantic affair of the kind the United States ever has known.

No figures were available which would show the number of actual slackers who were in this big group, but Charles De Woody, chief of the New York division of the Department of Justice and director of the round-up, said last night that the number would be comparatively small and that the first day of the raids had demonstrated that New York is, on the whole, a patriotic city.

12,000 IN ONE ARMORY.

Late last night Mr. De Woody estimated that 12,000 men had been brought to the Sixty-ninth Regiment Armory and passed through the receiving pen. These were men from Manhattan and the Bronx. Of this number 200 were taken to Camp Upton or Governor's Island to be inducted immediately into the Army; 200 more were locked up, with the certainty that they will go to court the first thing this morning; and 400 were sent to the Tombs as United States prisoners, on the assumption that they probably would turn out to be slackers. It was estimated that about 1,000 men will be turned into the Army as a result of yesterday's round-up in Manhattan alone.

The 12,000 who passed through the armory does not include those who were merely taken to police stations, questioned there, and released. Just how many were handled in this way no one knows. One official estimated the number at two-thirds the total arrested. But the general opinion was that this estimate was far too high.

Then follows—

SWEEP IN JERSEY, TOO.

Five thousand were taken into custody in Brooklyn, 1,500 in Queens, 1,500 in Passaic, about 8,000 in Jersey City and Hoboken, 1,500 in Paterson, and scattering hundreds in other New Jersey towns and Westchester County. Except for Manhattan no figures on the approximate number of slackers were available.

Enough was learned, however, to show that in the vast majority of cases the man arrested had merely been careless in leaving home without his draft card—or unfortunate in appearing of draft age when in reality he was older or younger.

Follow, Senators, please, the remainder of this sentence—

Picture to yourself what this raid was. The young-looking old man is taken in instanter, although he can not possibly have a card; the young man who might be within the particular ages is taken in as well; but just think of it, it was "unfortunate" that men who, from their facial expression or perhaps their garb, appeared to be within the draft age, when in reality they were not within the draft age, were rounded up and imprisoned.

Now, what happened to these men who were taken into custody?

Late last night the weeding-out process was still continuing in the five armories to which the arrested men have been taken. Cots were being set up for large numbers of them.

Oh, ye beardless boys who look to be within the ages of 21 to 31, ye men well preserved who may appear to be within the draft age, grow ye your gray whiskers and put on the habiliments of superannuated age, or an extrajudicial authority in the city of New York or elsewhere will take you to the "bull pen" until you can demonstrate by a birth certificate, a thousand miles away perhaps, your real age!

I read again:

So greatly did the number of arrests exceed expectations that the facilities were vastly overtaxed. In the Sixty-ninth Armory the commissary supplies were exhausted and hundreds of men went for many hours without food.

Where was it that this occurred? Would you say, if you had not been advised to-day, that this thing were even possible in free America? In terrorized Germany perhaps it might happen; and the very purpose, according to my idea of this sort of proceeding, is the purpose that has ever attended this kind of thing the world over—terrorism, the same sort of terrorism that makes it impossible to-day for any newspaper in this land to print what it desires, the same sort of terrorism that makes it to-day a crime for any man in this Nation loyally, legitimately, and honestly to speak his sentiments upon the rostrum or to his neighbors. Terrorism! That is the design of this kind of proceeding. Terrorism! The terrorism that takes for granted that a great people fighting a righteous and just war are not loyal and are not patriotic. Infinitely better would it be that our Government proceed upon the theory, now demonstrated, that our people are loyal and patriotic and determined to win this war.

Reading further from this article:

An attempt was made to remedy this last night by taking groups of them out to different restaurants under guard.

Men in groups of fifty or a hundred, prodded by bayonets to restaurants—men who committed no crime, were guilty of no sin, but simply because they looked as if they might be of a certain age they were "suspected" by unknown individuals and treated as if they were criminals.

Finally it was necessary to abandon the round-up temporarily in order to give the weary crusaders—an opportunity to catch up with their work.

HAD TO USE SCHOOL YARD.

So large was the number of men rounded up on the upper west side early in the evening that the police stations could not accommodate them and prisoners were taken to the yard of Public School No. 17 in West Forty-seventh Street and to the First Field Artillery Armory. Another armory in Manhattan probably will be opened for such use to-day. In the West Sixty-eighth Street police station 305 of the 2,000 men admitted they had failed to register.

A great haul—

was made along Broadway shortly before the opening of the theaters. Fifty men were picked up in front of the Knickerbocker Hotel at Forty-second Street and Broadway. In Harlem 500 negroes were taken. In the receiving stations were represented men of widely varying degree of social standing and wealth.

I read now Mr. De Woody's statement. Please listen, my brethren, to this:

"Because of the tremendous influx of men at the armory," Mr. De Woody said finally, "all examiners must begin to make a more careful check of all men taken to police stations and must take to the armories only those who appear to be slackers. The American Protective League operatives must cull their men more thoroughly.

Was ever such a presentation made in any government under the sun that made a pretense of freedom, that a body, unofficial in character, unknown as to its personnel, wholly extrajudicial, could gather up 30,000 or 40,000 citizens, and then after putting them in jail and confining them in various "bull pens," should be naively told by the official in charge that they ought to "cull their men more thoroughly."

"Too many cases which should obviously have been thrown out have been brought to the already overcrowded armory for us to pass on."

Then follow the various headlines of this article:

Business to suffer.
An unfamiliar sight.

Next—

Began early at railways.

Next—

Got taste of discipline.

And under that heading I read:

As fast as groups of 50 or 100 had been collected in rooms set aside in the two stations they were told by a sergeant to fall in. Here they got their first taste of discipline.

Innocent citizens of the Republic, with a bayonet behind them, for no crime, for no wrong, "got their first taste of discipline."

If they had suit cases a porter did not carry them; the prisoners did that work. And they marched with military briskness from the stations to the Sixty-ninth Regiment Armory.

Behind each group was a sergeant, and if one of the captives showed signs of faltering or letting down his bags he heard a sharp "Hold up there! Hold up there! Hip, hip, hip!"

Where is it that forced along with a sergeant behind him the innocent citizen marches and gets his "first taste of discipline," the citizen not arrested upon a writ, not indeed taken into custody because of aught he has done? Why, it is in the most populous city of the great democracy of the world that behind this citizen strides a sergeant with a bayonet and says, "Hold up there! Hip, hip, hip!"

What a spectacle, Senators, is this presented to our view!

Then the headlines proceed:

Drive strolls interrupted.

Again—

Hundreds sent for cards.

Again—

Amazed clothing workers.

And the irony of this paragraph I beg you to observe:

One of the most spectacular raids was made by hundreds of men who were sent into the clothing factory district just at the noon hour. As the workers poured out of the lofts about Twenty-third Street they found questioners waiting for them, and soon there was a long line of prisoners.

Many workers, however, got by and went to Madison and Union Square parks for their usual noon outings. The command went out to surround both parks and then everybody therein was questioned. Even a gray-bearded man who must have been at least 70 was not permitted to leave.

Why, the irony of the pretense that we make, and then of the act that we do!

In the noon hour soldiers and sailors also went through Battery Park. At another period a company of guards took positions in Wall Street and everybody was stopped and questioned. This also produced results. That the guards meant business was evident from a reply that a soldier gave to a reporter when asked what he would do if a prisoner should attempt to run away.

"Shoot him" was the laconic reply.

Then follow these headlines:

Got them at "movies" too.

Then—

Played no favorites.

And then there is the headline:

"Bull pen" grew jammed.

Every slacker or violator of the law should be punished. None subject to military service should be permitted to escape. But to humiliate 40,000 citizens, to shove them along with bayonets, to subject them to prison and summary military force, merely because they are "suspects," is a spectacle never before presented in the Republic. And this has been done when admittedly only 1 per cent might be "slackers."

I speak upon this subject, Mr. President, because, as I said once before in this body some two or three months ago, there is only one place in all this land where there can be now even a measure of free expression. There is just one place in all this Nation where men, perhaps cloaked in the privilege of their office, are given the power to raise their voices in protest or in denunciation. The only place left in all this land where liberty finally may have its fight made for it, and where freedom may be protected, is right here in this body; and our democracy depends not alone upon our sitting here and doing as we ought to do in respect to this war. Our democracy depends not alone upon doing all that may be asked of us for the winning of this war, but our democracy depends, too, upon the courage, the moral courage, of the men who sit here, 96 in number, in this one body. Our democracy, its preservation and its perpetuity, depend upon these men and upon their courage.

It is my purpose, Mr. President, in the future—I care not what may be the consequences; I care not what epithets may be cast, or what may be asserted when any protest is made against any illegal act—I intend hereafter, in the future, to voice at least the protest of one man upon this floor whenever terrorism is attempted or militarism runs rampant.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from California if he knows whether or not the writ of habeas corpus has been suspended?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the writ of habeas corpus and every other writ, when this thing is possible, has been in fact suspended. I want to say further that if the junior Senator from New York would relate what he saw and what he knows, he would tell you a tale of terrorism of good men and good women, patriotic men and patriotic women, that beggars description, and, indeed, is a tale that exceeds in its ugliness any tale that ever was related since we became a Republic.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I inquire further whether the Senator thinks this is one of the ways of making democracy safe for the world or for the United States of America?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, many of my colleagues, and among them the distinguished and very able and cultured Senator from Illinois, have been very much concerned because of our socialistic ventures, and because we have taken various sorts of property under the urge of war or for war purposes or permanently. I am not so much concerned with these material things; but I am concerned—concerned so deeply that I can hardly adequately express myself—for the humanity of this land, and for the preservation of those things that up to this time we have deemed inalienable; the right of every man to pursue his course legitimately, patriotically in response to the law, and thus living to have his freedom and his liberty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not care to take any time. I wish simply to state that some years before this war broke out a Prussian officer on the streets of Berlin ran a shoemaker through the body and killed him. I refer to what was known as the Zabern affair. It was in time of peace. He did this because the shoemaker would not get off the street in accordance with the order of the Prussian officer. The officer was not tried by the laws that relate to criminal offenses. I want to ask the Senate if it thinks there is any material difference between militarism in Berlin, when in time of peace an officer runs a man through the body and is simply tried by a court-martial and reprimanded and given an inconsequential sentence, and bayoneting innocent men around over the streets of New York City when there is no martial law proclaimed, when civil law is in full effect; whether there is any difference between democracy in the United States and militarism and Kaiserism in Berlin?

DRY ZONE AROUND MUNITION PLANTS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, as the Senator from Washington has withdrawn his objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) which I introduced a short time ago. I ask to have it read, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution referred to by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 172.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this joint resolution, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, this joint resolution is in the exact form of a provision in the pending Agricultural bill, and which the Senate has adopted. The object in introducing it and urging its passage at this time is this:

There are shipbuilding yards and factories in the United States situated in dry territory, and near those yards there have been temporarily established townships and villages for the purpose of selling liquor. I have one in mind. The northern part of the State is Minnesota is dry, the city of Duluth, and all the mining district. Situated in Duluth is a large steel plant manufacturing for the Government and two shipbuilding yards. Across the bay in the State of Wisconsin the city of Superior is dry, but under the laws of Wisconsin a village may be organized, and 15 or 20 men have organized a village a few miles out of Superior, a mile and a quarter from the big steel plant, and are running special wagons loaded with liquor into the steel plant, into Duluth, into the mining district, and into the shipyards. The President ought to have power to establish a zone around those plants, and it ought not to await the slow progress of the Agricultural bill. From the discussion within the last few days, I should say it may be 30 days before the bill is finally agreed upon in conference.

I therefore ask that the Senate pass this joint resolution at once, as it is very important.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I might ask the Senator—although now that he has taken his seat I will not do so—in view of his interest in the efficiency of the war industries, as manifested by this joint resolution, to explain to the Senate the somewhat inconsistent proposition of stopping these truck loads of beer that are going into the steel works. A short time ago a member of the Shipping Board appeared before one of the committees of the Senate and testified at considerable length, and his testimony was given a great deal of publicity in the newspapers, that it was absolutely necessary for the efficiency of workers in the shipyards that they should have intoxicating liquors to drink. It seems to me that if the administration is right about that, the carrying of truck loads of intoxicants into the shipyards and into the steel plants ought to be encouraged.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. I want to call attention to a letter, which is somewhat in conflict, however, with the testimony which I refer to, that was given by Mr. Colby, I think, a member of the Shipping Board, to the effect that the drinking of intoxicants increased the efficiency of workers. I have always understood that men advocated the right and privilege of drinking intoxicating liquors as a matter of personal liberty or pleasure or health, but it is the first time that I ever heard it argued from a high and responsible quarter that the drinking of intoxicating liquors increased the efficiency of workingmen 25 per cent.

Mr. President, the American Federation of Labor has joined with the Shipping Board in the contention that it is necessary for the efficiency of these employees of shipyards to have all that they want to drink, but I notice that there is some difference of opinion in the ranks of union labor itself on that subject. One of the most intelligent organizations of union labor, in my opinion, is the carpenters' union, and I want to read to the Senate a very brief letter which I have here from one of the local unions of that organization at Hoquiam, Wash. It says:

I am inclosing herewith sheets of a kind of literature that makes me warm, then hot, then boiling, then fighting mad—hence this channel of relief. Perhaps you are as well aware as we are here on the harbor that the absence of intoxicating liquors is of vast benefit in the shipbuilding industry, just now so important to our country. A man who pretends the opposite is as truly playing the German game as though he openly served under the German flag. The inclosed circular—

Referring to a circular attached to the letter, issued by the union label trades department of the American Federation of Labor, signed by John J. Manning, secretary-treasurer of that organization, resolving that the executive board of the union label trades department of the American Federation of Labor declares "its opposition to further prohibitory action, to the President of the United States, the Fuel Administrator, and to the Congress, setting forth the board's reasons therefor," with the reasons attached. Referring to that circular, this carpenters' union of Hoquiam, Wash., says, as I was proceeding to read:

The inclosed circular speaks "bunk" and libels the good name of 3,000 workers in the Aberdeen and Hoquiam yards. Mr. Schwab, who was recently here, should be able to absolutely blast the false statements of this inclosed circular. I know of no worker who claims or intimates he could work better with a beer supply, and most any of the 3,000 would feel like punching the fellow who tried to picture the rank and file of our union men as having a loyalty to country that rests on a taste for beer rather than a loyalty that springs from mind and heart. Senator, you can not do too much against the whole beer push to suit us here. If some of our labor officials wear a "wet collar" with the chain in the brewers' hands, so much the worse for them. Some of our "leaders"— tried the same stunt in our State in 1914 and got a sharp calling down for it. Not everybody appreciates that, in this district at least, enough drinking men voted "dry" in 1914 to more than furnish the majorities won by the prohibition law. The proper title for some of these so-called "labor leaders" is "beer servers."

Referring to leaders of organized labor—

The mass of laboring men believe in, appreciate, and want national prohibition, with Uncle Sam's efficient fist behind it.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANKLIN H. BASSETT,
Secretary Hoquiam Carpenters and Aberdeen-Hoquiam Building Trades Council.

Mr. President, we have a resolution that was introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] this morning, and I want to make just a few brief comments upon it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator refers to that resolution, he intimated that he thought there was something inconsistent with this resolution and the position taken by the chairman of the Shipping Board. I want to call his attention to the fact that the resolution prohibits nothing. It is identical with the amendment adopted in the Senate in the pending Agricultural bill. It merely authorizes the President to establish zones, and in cases where he feels that it is necessary he will exercise the authority given.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], taken in connection with his remarks in presenting it, undoubtedly indicates that it is the purpose of the Senator from Minnesota that this shipment of beer from a neighboring town into the steel works should be stopped.

Mr. LENROOT. If in the President's judgment the sale of liquor interferes with efficiency in war-working plants, the President will establish these zones, or, if there be cases where he feels it does not interfere, presumably he will not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the resolution that was introduced by the Senator from Colorado, if I heard correctly the terms of it, inquired of the administration whether or not there was not some way whereby the President could direct the officers of the various bureaus employing large numbers of people in the District of Columbia to remove their offices and employees to some place outside of the District of Columbia, and the President take this action under the Overman law, that was recently passed by Congress. There was nothing in the Overman law that has anything to do with that; and I only mention it because of the misunderstanding that seemed to exist at the time the Overman law was before Congress and was adopted as to the need of that law as a great war measure. I do not recollect that anything has been done under the Overman law effecting any very radical change in the conduct of the business of the Government, although it was urged at the time as a matter of the utmost immediate importance and great pressing emergency of the Nation.

There is nothing in the law, regardless of the Overman Act, which would require any of these bureaus referred to to keep their employees in the District of Columbia. These are agencies of various kinds. It was not necessary that the Overman law should be passed to enable the President, according to the purport of the resolution of the Senator from Colorado, to direct offices employing large numbers of people to be established at some other place in the United States. The President had that authority before the Overman law was passed. The Overman law has not anything to do with it. There was not any such emergency for the passage of the Overman law as it was claimed to have, and it has had no effect whatever upon the conduct of the war. Nothing has been done since it passed that could not have been done before it was passed.

There is just one other matter, Mr. President, that I want to refer to very briefly, and that is the question that has been discussed with a good deal of heat as to the action of the Government in enforcing the draft law by arresting slackers in the city of New York. The claim is made that a great injustice was done and outrage perpetrated because in the enforcement of the act innocent men were also apprehended.

A short time ago the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] introduced a bill in Congress for the trial of the violators of the so-called espionage act by court-martial. Under the circumstances existing at that time and the difficulties that there had been in punishing disloyalty and pro-Germanism and treason in the country, I was inclined to favor the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Oregon. But it was opposed by the President, and the Senator from Oregon, although I assume he has not changed his opinion in regard to the merits of the principle represented by his bill, dropped the bill and publicly announced that he would not press it because it was opposed by the President.

Now and then there crops up in the Senate a reference to the President as the Commander in Chief, and from week to week we see Senators abandoning legislation which they had been advocating in bills which they had introduced because of the opposition of the Commander in Chief. We have a Commander in Chief. The President is Commander in Chief, but what is the President the Commander in Chief of? This doctrine that he is Commander in Chief of all the people of the United States, including Congress, is a new doctrine. The Constitution does not provide anything of that kind. The Constitution designates the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and of the Navy. The men who are enlisted in military services are compelled to obey his orders under the Constitution. But whenever this doctrine that he is the Commander in Chief of the Senate of the United States begins to have credence in the country, then will be time to talk about the failure of democracy.

I was very much surprised this morning, Mr. President, in view of this record of the Senator from Oregon, to hear him say that a slacker, a man who is subject to the draft and who is evading it, a man who is concealing his liability to military service in order that his neighbor might take his place, ought not to be arrested except by due process of law. That is quite a different proposition from the one he advocated a very short time ago. The law against espionage did not specify or define a military offense. It provided by statute a civil offense, and it was a departure from custom and ordinary principle for the Senator from Oregon to say that those guilty of that civil offense should be proceeded against by military court-martial. I believe, however, that there was much justification for the provision even in going to that extent, in view of the difficulties that we were confronted with in the beginning of our military efforts in this great war, which involves our national existence. So I was very much surprised to see the reverse attitude taken by the Senator from Oregon when he says that a purely military offense, opposition to the authority and the enforcement of the military law, the conscript act, which puts men under military order and military control, should not be punished and restrained except by civil process.

There was a statement made this morning which somewhat surprised me in this connection, that habeas corpus had been suspended in New York. There is nothing in the newspapers to that effect. What is habeas corpus? There is nothing in the instance that has been described here which would indicate that the writ of habeas corpus had been interfered with in the slightest degree. Everybody knows what it is; every lawyer at least. If a citizen of the United States wants to avail himself of that great bulwark of liberty he goes into a civil court, appears before a judge of competent jurisdiction, and makes an allegation that he is restrained of his liberty unlawfully by a certain person. Habeas corpus is the writ which the judge issues commanding the person who is alleged to be unlawfully restraining another person of his liberty to bring the prisoner before the court, that the reason for his imprisonment may be inquired into. I venture to say, notwithstanding the assertions this morning, that the writ of habeas corpus still flourishes in all its vigor in the civil courts of New York, and that there is not a man of the thousands who were apprehended by these officers in the performance, in my opinion, of their duty to put into effect the draft act for military service who could not have had the lawfulness of his imprisonment inquired into and a judicial decision rendered at the earliest possible moment by anyone of a dozen civil courts in the city of New York.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that armed soldiers went into business offices and took men from behind their desks, went into places of amusement and took them away from ladies whom they were escorting, and took men who were over the draft age and men who were under the draft age and put them in police stations and school yards and armories, and kept them under observation until they could send for some one who could prove that they were not slackers and were in good faith loyal citizens. Is it right for the Government to arrest men without notice under such circumstances?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; but I want to explain my answer by saying I think it is unfortunate in any case that an innocent man should be apprehended. Yet if it is found necessary in the search for slackers and evaders of the draft in the strictest kind of enforcement of the draft act to make inquiry in this way into the status of men about whom there is any doubt as to whether or not they are eligible to the draft, it is a justifiable military proceeding under military law.

There is some talk here about the outrage of a sergeant standing up behind and ordering men to step. A million and a half of the citizens of this country, as loyal, at least, as any of those referred to in this debate, are keeping step to the orders of sergeants in France and are obeying the military orders of their superior officers. In the enforcement of the law, in the inquiry which is necessary to be made as to whether or not a man is eligible, there is nothing which has been disclosed here of the facts in this proceeding that shows that any great hardship about which any lover of liberty need be unnecessarily excited has been visited upon any of these people. There is talk about terrorism and talk of injustice.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a second I will yield to the Senator. Yet there is no showing here, either from the newspaper articles that have been read or from the statements of Senators on the floor, that any great hardship has been imposed upon a single individual. There is nothing to show any serious mistreatment of anybody. On the contrary, the showing is that the inquiry in order to separate the cowards and the slackers among those who were arrested from those who had not violated the draft act was carried out as expeditiously as possible and efficiently, without any very great hardship upon anybody who was affected. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest to the Senator also, and ask his judgment as to this point: Of course, New York is a very important portion of the country and the people of New York ought to have their rights respected and observed, but New York is not the whole country and the people there have not, perhaps, a superior right to people in other parts of the country. If we grant that an officer in New York representing the Department of Justice or some other department has exceeded his authority and has done things he ought not to have done, is it fair to hold out to the world the picture of the whole country being unlawfully invaded or the rights of citizens invaded over the country and a state of terrorism existing, threatening the whole country? Is there any sort of justification for that kind of a view?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it is an exaggerated view of the matter and, as I said before, nothing to arouse the indignation of anyone who looks at it, it seems to me, in a judicial attitude and takes time to inquire into what actually occurred there before he proceeds to denounce it. Practically, the fact of the case is, we have very little information as to what actually occurred. There is a good deal of misapprehension, I think, about the number of slackers found; and I think the 300 slackers the Senator from New York referred to were not mentioned as 300 out of the entire 45,000, but 300 out of a certain contingent who were gathered in a certain district. That appeared from something that was later read into the RECORD. But if there were but a hundred slackers, men evading the duties of citizenship, in that city while a million and a half of their fellow citizens have responded to the orders of the country, donned the military uniform, obeyed the orders of their Government, and are fighting its battles amid the horrors of German warfare along the front line in France, the steps which were taken to apprehend these men who refused to do their duty, to live up to the obligations of citizenship at a time when the existence of the country is at stake, were justified if they were necessary in the enforcement of the act. I am not prepared to say that it was not necessary that this means should have been taken to identify them and to segregate them from those whom they were with.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not quite finished.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from Washington is a very able legislator and a very able lawyer. I desire to ask him if he thinks had this law been perfectly drawn and competently administered that such an abuse could have taken place under it? In other words, is any law perfectly drawn or competently administered which makes it necessary for the authorities to draw into a great net both the innocent and the guilty in order to ascertain who may be innocent and who may be guilty?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that is not the fault of the law. If there is any fault there at all, it is the fault of the administration of the law; it is not a question of legislation. It seems to me that we could not put into this statute detailed instructions as to just how it should be carried out; I think that there must be some latitude left to the administrative officers; and I am very glad to say that that discretion in the case of this law has been exercised by the Provost Marshal General and those acting under him very wisely and very efficiently, and that the latitude that was allowed him in the making of the regulations for the administration and enforcement of the law has been justified and vindicated.

Mr. FRANCE. Will the Senator yield while I explain what I have in mind?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I will yield briefly, but I should not care to have the Senator go on at much length.

Mr. FRANCE. I wish to say that this whole incident has come about owing to the defects which existed in the first draft law. If under that law the suggestions which were made from this side of the Chamber had been adopted, if in April or in May, 1917, the measures which were urged upon this side had been accepted, all the men from 18 to 45 years of age would have been enrolled; each one would have had his card; each one bearing a card would have been wearing an insignia of the service; and such an abuse could not have occurred. The whole thing has come about through an imperfectly and inadequately drawn law and through a law incompetently administered. That is my judgment, and I desire to have that suggestion go into the RECORD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very glad to have yielded to the Senator from Maryland to allow him to make that statement. I do not, however, agree with him either as to the inadequacy of the law or as to the incompetency of its administration. I think the law is adequate and that its administration has been excellent and most efficient.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact, if he will yield for a moment, that we have all admitted that the law was inadequate, inasmuch as we have amended it recently so that men are included who are of the ages from 18 to 45. I am referring to the law which was in operation at the time when this general raid took place. We all realize that the law providing for registration only of those from 21 to 31 was defective; and for that reason we amended it to include those of lesser and greater ages.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The changing of the ages of the draft is quite a different matter from the registration provided for under the law. That has not been changed in any material respect.

Mr. BENET. Will the Senator from Washington allow me to make a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BENET. Since this discussion came up, I have talked with Provost Marshal General Crowder, and he has authorized me to say that his department had nothing to do with these arrests and did not authorize them. I simply state that for the benefit of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who has the floor, as it bears out the position he has taken. The arrests were not made under the authority or with the knowledge of anyone who is connected with the administration of the selective-draft law.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask a question just there?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. If the War Department did not authorize these arrests, who did order the soldiers and the sailors of the United States to make them? The soldiers and sailors of the United States obey only their superior officers. They never would have been there for any other reason. Somebody in authority called out the United States troops. Who was it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Whoever it was, I myself am mighty glad that it was done, and I hope they will do it all over the United States.

Mr. LODGE. That is another question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope that every slacker, every man who is subject to the draft and who is evading it, will be apprehended and not through any court proceedings, because it is a military proceeding. They are subject to orders when they are registered and they ought to be apprehended and put into the military camps for training and made to do their duty in accordance with the law. The administration is worthy of commendation instead of denunciation for doing it.

I have criticized the administration in a mild way at different times because of its negligence in enforcing the draft law, because of its refusal to put men to work or to put them to fight when they had been exempted to go into the war industries of the country and then quit work and loafed upon the streets, with the approval and the tacit consent of the administration. I have criticized the administration in times past because of the delay of the administration in enforcing those statutes which have been placed upon the books in order to compel loyalty to and support of the Government in a foreign war; but when the Government acts, when the Government takes drastic measures to enforce these laws down to the last man who is violating them, I want to speak in approval of such action. I do not want to hold the administration up to obloquy, I do not want to have it go out all over the country that the Senate of the United States is unanimous in its objection to any measures whatever that may be necessary on the part of the Government to enforce these war measures. I trust that we can avoid the demoralizing effect that such an idea would create among those who are already too prone to shirk their responsibility or even to aid the enemy.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment. Something has been said in criticism of the American Protective League. I have not any connection with it at all, but I want to say that the men who belong to that organization have rendered an invaluable service to the country. Instead of being denounced as extraconstitutional and extralegal—as it may be they are—they are entitled to the thanks and to the gratitude of the country for aiding the officials of the Government in searching out disloyalty and treason and for upholding the hands of the people in the conduct of this great struggle. Now I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has been very kind in yielding and I wish merely to make a brief explanation.

When I referred to incompetence in the enforcement of the law I was referring to such incidents as this incident in New York. I was not referring to any incompetence on the part of the Provost Marshal General, for I think that Provost Marshal General Crowder is one of the great figures which have been developed by this war, and I am sure we all recognize the distinguished service he has performed.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Washington will allow me, I desire to say that he misunderstood my question. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] stated by authority that the Provost Marshal General had stated that these arrests were not made by his orders; that he had nothing to do with them. We are all of one opinion about the Provost Marshal General; he has carried out the great and difficult work of the draft most admirably, and he has not ordered the proceeding which has taken place in New York. Now, if we are going to commend that, as the Senator from Washington proposes, who is to be commended? Whether we condemn or commend, we ought at least to know whom we must praise or whom we must condemn. I only wanted to get the information.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would rather reply to one Senator at a time; but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I did not misunderstand his question. I was referring to a statement made somewhat earlier.

Mr. LODGE. I said the Senator from Washington misunderstood my question. I was not discussing the matter of what was done in New York at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I did not misunderstand the question of the Senator from Massachusetts. I agree with him in the suggestion implied in his question, that when soldiers and sailors act they act under the authority of the military; they can not act under any other authority; and, regardless of the merits of the question, the military authorities must be responsible for the action of the men under their command. I agree entirely with what the Senator says in that respect.

Mr. LODGE. And yet Gen. Crowder has stated, through the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET], that he had nothing to do with it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Personally or in his official capacity he may not have had anything to do with it, but that does not make any difference. Because I express a complimentary opinion about Gen. Crowder is no reason why there are not some things which we may discuss even though Gen. Crowder did have nothing to do with them.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with what the Senator has said about Gen. Crowder fully; but he is charged with the enforcement of the draft law, and he has not used the troops for the purpose for which they were used in New York. Who has?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will let the Senator inquire further into that—undoubtedly their superior officers. The President, of course, is responsible, he being the Commander in Chief of the Army, although he is supposed to act through the Secretary of War.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I might suggest that possibly it was done at the instance of the district boards in New York. They may be anxious to round up these men in order to make easier the next registration, on the same theory as the board in this city has sent with their pay checks circulars to all the department clerks suggesting that they register here, no matter where they come from. This incident may have occurred because of the extraordinary zeal of the district boards.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad that they have some extraordinary zeal if that be the case.

Some reference has been made here to jabbing citizens around with bayonets. That would be a very serious thing if they were jabbed around with bayonets; but there is nothing whatever in the report of this proceeding to disclose that anybody was jabbed around with a bayonet. I think it would not hurt a slacker very much if he were jabbed around a little with a bayonet, but there is no indication here that that was done.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Is it the Senator's idea that if a man fails to register or is a slacker in that respect and does not comply with the proclamation of the President and present himself for registration that he is subject to being rounded up by soldiers or sailors or under the military laws to be arrested and taken before the board and registered?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If he is subject to registration under the law, he is subject to military orders.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the law does not say so. The law that we enacted provided just exactly what shall be done. The civil courts must be appealed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, whatever may be provided as a supplementary proceeding in that respect, under the entire act a man subject to the draft who refuses or fails to register, or if registered absents himself from the places where the conscripts are ordered to assemble, is subject to military arrest. By express provision all departments of the Government are subject to the orders of the President for the enforcement of the law, and the President is required to make any order, rule, or regulation necessary for the enforcement of the act.

There is just one further thing I wish to refer to, Mr. President, and that is the reference which has been made to and the denunciation of an alleged state of terrorism which the country is now in. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to it. I have the very greatest respect for the opinions of the Senator from California, but we are all expected to act upon our individual judgment about these matters. I myself do not feel, either as a citizen or as a Senator, that there is any state of terrorism in this country. I do not believe that any loyal newspaper really has any fear of publishing what it chooses to publish within the law and the truth. If it has, it is a craven coward and unworthy of the consideration of the Senate. Any man who is really a man, who obeys the law and supports the Government, is perfectly immune and, in my judgment, knows that he will have the protection of the law in exercising his rights as a citizen. I think that we are very far from having a state of terrorism. The very editorial from the New York World read to the Senate by the Senator from Oregon, denouncing in the most unmeasured terms this act of the Government, shows that that paper at least is not terrorized and is not afraid to express its opinion.

There are things for which I would criticize the Government in regard to newspapers, not so much as to present conditions as those which existed for a long time after we went into the war and up to a quite recent date. Newspapers which fawned upon the administration and which yet opposed the Nation in this war, certain disloyal papers—pro-German papers—flattering the administration were published. But that is very largely overcome, and I do not believe that a loyal paper in the United States which supports our cause in this great war is in any state of terrorism or has any reason to be afraid of printing the truth in criticism of public officials. If it is afraid, it mistakes the temper of the American people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I can not agree with some of the views expressed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. Of course, I agree with everything that he says so far as he expresses the opinion that everybody should be 100 per cent loyal to the country and to the war in which we have engaged. Of course, I agree with him that the legislation that Congress has passed should be thoroughly and effectively enforced; but, Mr. President, we had better not get excited on either side of this question until we know the facts relating to the whole transaction. We have seen newspaper accounts of what is alleged to have happened in New York yesterday; we have heard the statement of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] about what he saw and what he has heard; we have had various denials from several bureaus or departments of the Government as to their connection with the original transaction; but the question in my mind is whether or not what was done in New York was done according to law. If it was done in the legal enforcement of the draft act, I have no criticism to make of it; but I have yet to learn—and I shall be surprised to learn—that the draft act authorized the proceedings which are alleged to have taken place in New York on yesterday.

Mr. President, there is no man in Congress who has a greater contempt for a slacker than I have; there is no man here or elsewhere who will do more to bring to book and to round up, always by legal authority and by due process of law, the civilian who has not yet entered upon the military service of the United States though compelled to register as eligible for that service when called; but, Mr. President, it is not wise, in my opinion, in the naturally inflammable state of public opinion and hostility to slackers, directly or indirectly, to say a word which shall put in jeopardy the rights of peaceful citizens who are not liable to military service.

I do not know that I thoroughly understand all that the Senator from Washington said; but if he means that by the violation of the rights of 39,000 people who are not subject to military service and were not eligible to the draft and were not of draft age and were not compelled by law to register as such, if 100 slackers or 10 slackers were caught, he is satisfied with the proceedings, I entirely disagree with him. Every man in this country is entitled to a government by law, Mr. President. Even the Army and the Navy and the Department of Justice are subject to laws passed by Congress and to the Constitution of the United States. It is not necessary to assert that the writ of habeas corpus has been suspended. Everybody knows that it has not, and it has not been violated in this case. The Senator from Washington, in my opinion, is quite correct when he says that matter does not concern the subject under consideration. If anybody has been illegally arrested, he should have applied to the court for a writ of habeas corpus to be discharged, unless the State could show good reason for holding him; but that question did not come up in these alleged irregularities that took place in the city of New York yesterday.

Here were 40,000 people, old and young, arrested and herded into armories; arrested, not by a warrant issued by civil authority, but grabbed by people, as the New York World states, under authority assumed and exercised by one De Woody, who is the representative of the Department of Justice, so it is stated, in New York City. Now, either Mr. De Woody and the Department of Justice had authority to conduct this raid and round-up, or they did not. If they had authority, they could only have had authority granted by a United States statute, by an act of Congress. I believe in the enforcement of the draft act radically and thoroughly. Was this raid conducted in accordance with the provisions of the draft act, or of any legislation passed by Congress for its enforcement? I do not know. I have not read the draft act this morning. I do not recall anything in the draft act by which innocent people are subject to restraint of their liberty because the military authority of the United States, acting through its soldiers and sailors, under command of their officers, may suspect that a man is subject to the draft act or is a slacker.

I do not recall that there is anything in the draft act that compels a registrant to continually carry his certificate of registration with him, on his person. Now, there may be such a provision; and if there is, and a duly constituted agent of the Department of Justice, or possibly of the local board, has been authorized by law to accost a stranger and arrest him unless he can show his card of registration, then I am willing to concede that the proceeding may have been legal; but I do not know those facts yet. I have been informed on the floor here this morning that there is no provision in the law which requires a registrant to carry his certificate of registration always with him. But this proceeding, where men who came to New York City and got off of a train are immediately taken into custody upon their personal appearance because they are suspected of being of draft age, and put into an armory and held there, restrained of their liberty, their business appointments canceled, deprived of food, taken out later in the day and given food at a restaurant under the direction of a military sergeant, allowed to eat at his sufferance, is a proceeding for which I should like to have the law shown to me before I approve of it, because I am surprised if that is the law.

As I say, I do not propose to fly into a passion upon this question in either direction. As the Senator from Massachusetts has said, what we ought to do, if we do anything, is to ascertain the facts, for it is a serious question. I am not going to denounce the Department of Justice, who, the junior Senator from New York says, disavow the whole proceeding and say they are utterly ignorant of it, nor the office of the Provost Marshal General, who says that he is equally ignorant of the whole proceeding; nor am I prepared to denounce an organization because it is extraconstitutional or extralegal. It may be a voluntary association, and the American Protective League may have done all the good things and be as patriotic as the Senator from Washington says, and as I say and think. At the same time it is not one of the duly constituted agencies of our Government for the enforcement of justice or of the law. I do not know what part it had in this proceeding; so I hope the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on the Judiciary will take pains to request the heads of the various departments of the Government to advise us what instructions were issued.

Of course, if the head of the Department of Justice has a law authorizing the proceeding upon his statement that upon knowledge and belief and information a lot of men subject to the draft who were trying to evade it, known as slackers, would be in New York on a certain day—if he has authority of law to arrest them, I can well understand that upon his request to either the War Department or the Navy Department, the heads of those departments would put at the service of the Department of Justice, if in the opinion of the Department of Justice it was necessary, such military force as, acting under the civilian authority, would arrest these men. But that men can be indiscriminately arrested and deprived of their liberty without a charge being made against them, or a writ or a warrant in the hands of a properly accredited official of this Government, upon suspicion, of course violates every constitutional right in this country as to a man's not being liable to be deprived of his life or of his liberty or of his property without due process of law. Because this country is at war, the Constitution is not suspended, nor are the constitutional guarantees suspended, and we have not yet been turned over to the military authority in this country, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I just want to ask the Senator a question. I agree with him entirely that we want to know the facts and the law before we either praise or condemn; but it seems to me it is very important that we should know who ordered the troops of the United States and the sailors of the United States to take part in a proceeding of this magnitude, because the control of the Army and the Navy is a very serious matter. Provost Marshal General Crowder denies any association with it. The Department of Justice had nothing to do with it. Who is ordering our soldiers and sailors to do this particular work?

I am not denying the right; I only want to find out who is responsible, and who gave the order. Does it not seem to the Senator that that is a good point to reach?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes, Mr. President. In a matter that may develop as a very grave matter, such as this may, it would be a very uninspiring example to set before the country of the competence of the United States Senate if we should go off half-cocked and take action upon a subject merely on the basis of a newspaper report and the statement of a Senator as to what he saw, without knowing anything about whether it is authorized in the law or not. Therefore the Senator from Massachusetts and I are in entire accord that we should find out who ordered these soldiers and sailors to participate in this transaction that occurred in New York, and who ordered Mr. De Woody to do what he did in connection with the matter. I have no doubt that to-morrow we will be in possession of information from the various departments of the Government which will give us the facts in this matter.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator has said that he had not the draft act before him at this time. Section 5 of the draft act provides:

Every such person—

That is, those between 21 and 31—

shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall wilfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. That, of course, contemplates the registration of these draftees, or eligible draftees, and their punishment for not registering, and that is all conducted under the civil authority.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, after they are registered they are subject to call, and then become liable to military duty; but they are classified into different classes, so that of the total of something like 9,600,000 who registered under the first draft there were something like 3,000,000 who became subject to military law. The others, unless they were called, classified in class 1, and notified to report at a certain time, were not under military law and subject to military authority. Up to that time, of course, they were subject to the civil authority and civil tribunals.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I understand perfectly. Now, I am not criticizing any department of the Government for arresting a man who was subject to the military authority of the Government without any action of the Department of Justice or any participation whatever of the civil authorities. If he is subject to military discipline and is slacking, he should be treated almost like a deserter. He should be arrested by the military arm of the Government, to whose orders he is subject. I am talking about the military arm of the Government or the civil arm of the Government, either, conducting an indiscriminate dragnet and arresting 40,000 people, without knowing whether they are subject to the military authority of the Government or not, on suspicion, and then picking out and releasing those that it could not prove are slackers and retaining those that it can prove are slackers.

Mr. FALL. I am in thorough agreement with the Senator, except that I go further. In my judgment the secret-service officers of any department—the Department of Justice, for example—would have no right to round up 20,000 or 30,000 or 10,000 or 5,000 men upon the supposition that there might be among that number two or three or a dozen or a thousand men who were liable to military service and who were slackers or who were seeking to evade such military service. Of course I am not there making a technical distinction between liability to military service and being within the military service. When a man is in the military service he is subject to arrest by the provost guard; but when a man is liable to military service he is yet protected by the Constitution of the United States and the civil laws and the courts.

Mr. KIRBY obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a vote on the joint resolution before he begins his remarks?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. As I remember, in the previous joint resolution upon a kindred subject, the zones which the President was authorized to establish in the proximity of military posts both of the Army and of the Navy were limited in extent to a distance of 5 miles from the military post.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not sure about that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not sure about it, but I say it is my impression. At any rate, whatever the fact may be as to that, I notice that the joint resolution as offered by the Senator authorizes the President to establish such zones around coal mines, shipbuilding plants, and other plants engaged in war-supply activity as in his discretion may be necessary. Now, I simply suggest to the Senator that while, of course, I do not assume that the Executive would do it, under that joint resolution the President of the United States, if he wanted to, could establish zones of such size as to put the whole country, by Executive order, on a bone-dry basis.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator that I have simply followed the exact language which the Senate considered and adopted at a previous time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is not law now, is it?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; it is not law, but it has passed the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am willing and anxious to give the President authority to establish a dry zone in the neighborhood of any industry that is producing war materials or in any way aiding the war—I do not care if it is 10 miles or 15 miles—but to say that the President can make it of such extent as he thinks necessary might include the whole State, and I do not think that is called for. I wondered if the Senator could not modify his joint resolution so as to say that "the boundaries of said zone shall not be more than 10 miles distant from the industry to be protected," or some such clause as that, which would not give the President absolute authority.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is very difficult to say how much of a zone there should be. Take Fort Snelling, which is a little more than 10 miles from some parts of two large cities near it. Take Fort Sheridan, in Chicago. It is more than 10 miles from the south part of the city of Chicago. I do not think the President is liable to abuse this power by placing large zones, like whole States, in the prohibited district; and it is very difficult to draw a line exactly where that zone ought to end. The 5-mile zone has proven to be ineffective, because it is not large enough to prevent the sale of liquor in the camps.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I do not know how large such a zone ought to be, Mr. President. I do not know how far a man would travel to get a drink if he was thirsty enough; but it can not be that it is difficult to name some distance in excess of which the President is not authorized to go.

For instance, if there is a city within 20 miles of some place engaged in shipbuilding, and the city is not a prohibition city, or if it is 25 or 30 miles away, does the Senator want the whole city, irrespective of the action of its own people, if it has the local license system, to be subject to the possibility that the President may at any time establish prohibition in that city?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I do not; and I do not think there is any danger of that being done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Ah! There we come again to putting in the executive branch of the Government all authority, on the theory that they will exercise only a part of it. Mr. President, I do not like this kind of legislation that continually turns over to the executive branch of the Government these powers, subject to their unrestricted discretion, while we afterwards say among ourselves that we have given the power to the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have the draft act under which the President has authority to make zones around military camps. It reads:

That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps, and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army, as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable.

We passed, I think, a provision in the Senate for a 5-mile limit, but in conference the language came out, and what I have just read was agreed upon. Then in section 13, in reference to vice zones, and so forth, we leave it entirely to the discretion of the President. This language follows very much the language of those sections.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No, if the Senator will pardon me, not in my opinion. The statute the Senator reads succeeded a proposition already passed the Senate to limit the zone to 5 miles. The statute the Senator quotes from still has some words of partial limitation at least, because it says about or near the place; but the language used by the Senator from Minnesota is only such zone as the President may in his discretion establish.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true with reference to the liquor proposition, but here is a sentence from section 13:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, etc., * * * within such distance as he may deem needful of any military camp, station, etc.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not doubt the Senator could find an analogy for this sort of legislation, but if it is unwise legislation subject to the criticism I make upon it it is no answer to that criticism to say that we have been unwise in the past.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator suggested that it should be made to conform along the lines of previous legislation, and it does conform to the law we passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not quite.

Mr. LENROOT. I call attention to the fact that the language of the pending resolution is that zones may be established about these places. The language is the same as the language in the previous act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What importance does the Senator attach to the word "about."

Mr. LENROOT. It means that it must be beyond the shipyards or plants. It would be impossible for the President to make a State dry under the authority to establish a zone about a certain place.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "About" means all around, in my opinion, and does not circumscribe the length of the diameter at all. I may be mistaken, however.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House (H. Con. Res. 51) providing for the printing of a certain number of copies of H. R. 12863, entitled "A bill to provide revenue, and for other purposes."

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

S. 934. An act authorizing the State of Montana to select other lands in lieu of lands in section 16, township 2 north, range 30 east, within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project and the ceded portion of Crow Indian Reservation in said State;

S. 936. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Bozeman, Mont., certain land for alley purposes;

S. 4597. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.; and

H. J. Res. 325. Joint resolution amending section 8 of the amendment to the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask leave, out of order, to introduce a petition to be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage, the petition of a committee signed by Mrs. H. R. Allen, chairman, and Ethel A. Wragg, secretary. It is addressed to the President of the United States, the Vice President, and Senator MARTIN, and Senator GALLINGER—it was adopted before Senator GALLINGER's death—and to the two Senators from Idaho, my colleague and myself, praying for the immediate voting upon and passage of the amendment to the National Constitution providing for woman suffrage. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage, of which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] is chairman.

The motion was agreed to.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 558) thereon.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 4913) granting an increase of pension to Ellen L. Goodwin, which was read twice by its title and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ARREST OF ALLEGED SLACKERS.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion this morning about a matter not really before the Senate with great interest. The arbitrary use of power and its abuse is always to be deprecated. But, Mr. President, the enforcement of the draft law and the organization of an army necessarily must be done with dispatch and in a more or less summary way, and the discovery and apprehension of those who would violate the draft law and evade it and escape military duty must be proceeded with in that way, in my opinion.

I do not think there is any need for the United States Senate to become unduly excited because the editor of the New York World has thrown a fit about the particular manner of the enforcement of the draft law for apprehending slackers in New York. The editor of the New York World represents probably the policy of a great paper, but the New York World does not control the destinies of the world, nor of the United States, nor of the State of New York, nor even of the city of New York, and until a Senator comes upon this floor and complains with a resolution introduced for an investigation of the conduct it seems to me that it is beyond our province to consider the matter at all or waste the time of the Senate about it. I did not expect to take any time upon it and would not do so except for the observations that have been made by some other Senators.

The New York World and other newspapers of the country have frequently furnished more flagrant examples of the unwarranted exercise of power and abuse of privilege, in a more harsh and unjust manner in many instances, against public officials in villification and abuse of them because their official conduct did not square with the correspondents' or editors' idea of what their conduct should have been than is shown in the action of the authorities in New York in the apprehension of slackers and violators of the draft law.

So far as I am concerned, we have determined on the military policy of this country. We have determined the method of raising an army, and all the power of the Nation is behind that determination to organize the Army as it ought to be organized, summarily when necessary, and without especial regard to the wishes of those who would violate the law, who are slackers and who have been trying to evade service.

If in the necessary enforcement of this law in a summary way some individuals are inconvenienced or individual rights are infringed or invaded more or less, they must put up with that rather than that the law shall not be enforced.

It must be remembered that we have quite recently changed the law to take two out of three boys of all between 18 and 21 years of age in the draft for Army service, notwithstanding 1,000,000 below the age of 21 had already volunteered, and every time the one man of the hundreds of thousands of slackers in the first draft age escapes it requires one more man from below the first draft age of the boys who were unable to convince Congress of the reason or necessity for their exclusion from the last draft to take his place.

I do not know whether Gen. Crowder's department is responsible for the action complained of or not, and I do not care. I do not care whether the Department of Justice is responsible for it or not; but there must be a procedure to determine this matter, to discover the people who are slackers, and to put them into the Army where they belong. There evidently is authority behind this movement to do it. I do not think it should be exercised in an arbitrary way; I do not think authority ought to be abused; but I say to the Senate there is no need to worry about the condition that is said to exist yonder in the State of New York at this time. Let the slackers be rounded up, and if other people must suffer some slight inconvenience let it be remembered that it is for the general good. Let the Army be organized and the slackers apprehended effectively, with whatever haste and dispatch is necessary to accomplish the desired result.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there seems to be very little information upon this matter of a definite character. Therefore I offer the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration, with the hope that we can get information upon which we can rely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 297), as follows:

Whereas the daily papers have reported the seizure for examination or arrest and temporary incarceration of many thousand citizens, particularly in the State of New York; and

Whereas such reports indicate that in the so-called "round-up" sailors and soldiers in the uniform of the United States participated: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed immediately to investigate and report upon such alleged occurrences and as to who was or is responsible, if anyone, for the presence of such sailors and soldiers, or either, in such so-called "round-up," or arrest, and who, if anyone, issued orders, if any, resulting in the presence of such soldiers and sailors and their participation in the said occurrences, if they were so present and did so participate.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I suggest that the matter go to the proper committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator object to having this information?

Mr. KIRBY. No; but let the resolution go to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator objects to its present consideration, it can go over until the next day, and then let the Senate decide what it wants to do with the resolution under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KIRBY. I object.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has that right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. FALL. I should like to have the amendment reported, so that we may know upon what we are to vote.

Mr. KING. It is to strike out paragraph 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out beginning at line 4, line 23, paragraph 3, "for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture."

Mr. KING. It was read yesterday. It is paragraph 3.

Mr. FALL. One item of that section I know has already been stricken out.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gulon	McKellar	Sherman
Bankhead	Hale	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Beuet	Henderson	Martin	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Nugent	Thomas
Cummins	Kenyon	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	King	Penrose	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Phelan	Watson
Fall	Knox	Poindexter	Willey
Fletcher	Lenroot	Pomerene
France	Lodge	Shafroth
Gore	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] on important business, and to let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is necessarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on official business.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GUION], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Utah to strike out a certain portion of the bill, beginning on page 4, line 23.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on page 4, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the third paragraph, in the following words:

Third, for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products, for the following-stated purposes and in amounts as follows: Cereal-smut eradication, $50,000; peanut conservation and utilization, $15,000; control of cotton, truck, and forage-crop diseases, $117,550; farm storage of sweet potatoes, $30,000; location of Irish-potato seed stock, $7,500; plant-disease survey, $23,000; castor-bean production and utilization, $20,000; maintenance of field-bean seed supply, $10,000; production of cereals and grain sorghums, $53,250; sugar-beet nematode work, $10,000; pathological inspection of fruits during processes of marketing, $18,000; control of a new sugar-cane disease, $20,000; production of rice, $5,000; control of cereal and forage insects, $55,000; control of stored-product insects, $22,000; control of vegetable and truck-crop insects, $35,000; control of sweet-potato weevil, $30,000; control of deciduous-fruit insects, $45,000; control of citrus-fruit insects, $10,000; control of insects injurious to live stock, $20,000; control of rice insects, $3,000; control of sugar-cane insects, $9,000; general supervision of emergency insect-control work, $3,000; prevention of plant-dust explosions and fires, $75,000; fruit and vegetable utilization, $35,000; in all, $721,300.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am ready to vote on the amendment and not take up any further time in discussing it. I think if there is anything in the bill that is worth while at all it is this matter that is proposed to be stricken out. It looks to me as though it covers some of the most important subjects that we can deal with in a bill of this kind. The items have been recommended by the Department of Agriculture; they are not merely suggested by chiefs of bureaus or clerks or anything of that sort, as some Senators would seem to think. They come here recommended by the Department of Agriculture in furtherance of this matter of taking care of the whole subject of the production of food. I think they are items that ought to stay in the bill if any are to be retained.

Mr. KING. There are only about $10,000,000 in the bill to cover the same items. I simply ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote upon this amendment when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to have read and offer to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert a new section in the bill as follows:

SEC. —. That it shall be unlawful, except as herein otherwise provided, for any person, firm, or corporation knowingly to ship, offer for shipment, or transport in commerce among the several States or for commerce with foreign countries any concentrated commercial feeding stuffs containing any damaged feed, mill, elevator, or other sweepings or dust, buckwheat hulls, cottonseed hulls, peanut hulls, peanut shells, rice hulls, oat hulls, corncobs ground, cocoa shells, clipped oat by-product, ground or unground hulls, screenings, chaff, or other cleanings derived from the preparation, cleaning, or milling of any seed or grain when separated from the standard product as an offal or by-product, or such preparation, cleaning, or milling, humus, peat, spagnum moss, ivory-nut turnings, ground cornstalks, flax-plant refuse, sorghum pulp, ground or shredded straw or hay, sawdust, cellulose, or dirt, or any other foreign material.

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue a written permit for the shipment of concentrated commercial feeding stuffs containing a mixture of foreign material which in his judgment is inseparable from such prepared feeds, or which does not detract materially from its feeding value: Provided, That such feeding stuffs in packages be so labeled as to show to purchasers and users thereof specifically the percentage of each ingredient entering into the composition of same; or if such feed stuffs are shipped in bulk in carload lots, then the bill of lading and the bill from manufacturer to purchaser of same shall both show such analysis. The agency distributing to users of such feeds in less than carload lots shall deliver to the purchaser of each lot regardless of quantity sold a bill showing cost and a correct analysis of such feeding stuffs.

Any person or corporation who shall be convicted for violating the provisions of this section shall be liable to pay a fine of not less than $500 and not more than $5,000; or, in case of a natural person, to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, in the discretion of the court, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the Director General of Transportation, is authorized to prescribe suitable rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this section.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am fearful that if this amendment is adopted the requirements will be such that it will enhance the price of all cattle food that may be purchased in the United States. The requirements, if the amendment is enforced, upon the low-grade products that are fed usually by cattlemen will be such that they will almost double the price.

Mr. GORE. Has the Senator a printed copy of the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not seen a printed copy, I will say to the Senator, but I have it merely as the amendment was read from the desk.

Mr. GORE. I was going to suggest that the proviso in the second paragraph is designed to meet the objection which the Senator urges, and I think it does meet it.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have that part of the amendment read.

Mr. POMERENE. Before that is done may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill, who has offered the amendment, a question? Does not the Secretary of Agriculture now, under the pure-food law, have full power to adopt these regulations? I have not examined that statute for a long time, but——

Mr. GORE. I think probably the Senator is correct about that; but this abuse is going on in the country. It is unchecked. It has grown greatly in extent and in seriousness during the last year and a half, particularly since the mills have been placed under rules and regulations. I am informed that now the mills do not sell, as a rule, their by-products to farmers for feeding purposes, but that they pass through these concentration processes, which are dominated by a very small interest in the country, dominated by the packing-house people, and the farmers are subjected to great inconvenience. I have here a letter, which I will have read with the consent of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. It is a letter from the Bureau of Farms and Markets of the State of New York, and I may say that the enumeration contained in this amendment of these foreign substances was a resolution recommended by that organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

Mr. POMERENE. Before that is done, so that we may have the full benefit of it, I recognize the fact that this may be referring to a prevalent evil; but it does seem to me that before we frame up a criminal statute we ought to know whether it is going to conflict with any legitimate industry properly conducted.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will scrutinize the amendment, I do not think that is possible. It makes it unlawful, except as herein otherwise provided, to ship in interstate or foreign commerce concentrated feeding stuffs that contain certain admixtures that have no concentrated feeding value. It then provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may issue a written permit for the interstate shipment of feedstuffs which contain foreign matter that is inseparable, as some of it would be, or which contain foreign matter that does not detract materially from the feeding value of the stuffs.

Mr. POMERENE. But assuming that that is so, if the Agricultural Department have plenary power to deal with this subject, and they have there the benefit of expert knowledge upon the subject, I believe at the present time we ought to leave it to rest where it is.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think both Senators will agree that the Agricultural Department now has authority to prevent any adulteration in anything that is sent out for food for man or beast; and if there is as a part of the ingredient of any food entering into interstate commerce which has no food value, of course, it is an adulterant and can be dealt with under the present law.

But there is another matter in this amendment, and that is that this must be, I will not say absolutely, but free from dust.

Mr. SMOOT. And dirt.

Mr. McCUMBER. Cattle and hogs eat a great deal of dirt in a year. I do not know to what extent that would be enforced. Then there is a lot of foreign stuff, such as in wild buckwheat, that might not have any great value, and yet it might not be detrimental, and it might be impossible to get it out of this compound.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is evidently looking at the printed copy. There is a proviso in the amendment which I have just offered which meets that situation. Of course, it would not be possible to separate all foreign substances from feeding stuffs.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean that in the amendment he has just offered the proviso in the second paragraph obviates the objections raised by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]?

Mr. GORE. In the first part of the paragraph down to the proviso.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read it to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. It reads as follows:

> The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to issue a written permit for the shipment of concentrated commercial feeding stuffs containing a mixture of foreign material which, in his judgment, is inseparable from such prepared feeds, or which does not detract materially from its feeding value.

Then the proviso reads:

> Provided, That such feeding stuffs in packages be so labeled as to show to purchasers and users thereof specifically the percentage of each ingredient entering into the composition of same; or if such feedstuffs are shipped in bulk in carload lots, then the bill of lading and the bill from manufacturer to purchaser of same shall both show such analysis.

I desire to call attention to one thing which comes to my mind at this instant. There is an alfalfa mixture compounded with beet molasses, which is not put up in packages, and is mostly sold in less than carload lots. There is no provision in this proviso that takes care of a case like that, though it does provide for packages and for feeds in carload lots.

Mr. GORE. Of course, that omission ought to be remedied.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it does seem to me that we ought not to pass a measure of this kind unless we find, in the first place, that it is really necessary in order to meet an evil; and, in the second place, we can be assured that it is not going to conflict with regulations which the Agricultural Department, after a very careful study, may have adopted. If the evil prevails that seems to be indicated by these resolutions, I think we should address the matter to the Agricultural Department and let them adopt additional regulations, if any be necessary.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rather agree with the Senator from Ohio that the existing law confers sufficient authority to meet the objects proposed by this amendment. Notwithstanding, however, that authority exists, this evil prevails; the existing law as it is administered has not eradicated the evil. The truth is the evil has been running rampant for the last year and a half, and it is becoming universal. It is becoming a most serious menace to the farmers and a burden upon them.

The proposal of this amendment is to prohibit the interstate shipment of feed containing these various adulterants. I may say that the enumeration of the adulterants which have actually been found by the director of the experiment station in New York in feedstuffs offered for sale and which are sold to the farmers of that State is an amazing one. I have here an analysis of these various ingredients. I shall not cumber the RECORD or tax the Senate's patience with it, because I can not understand it and I assume the Senate could not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what would be gained in effectiveness by duplicating the authority to deal with this subject?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the existing law seems to require affirmative action upon the part of the Agricultural Department to interdict and to stop this evil. This proposed law takes affirmative action and penalizes the act, and requires affirmative action by the Secretary of Agriculture to except out of the operation of the law the transmission of feed stuffs containing foreign matter that is inseparable or that is not seriously deleterious.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator from Oklahoma prepared to say that the present regulations of the Agricultural Department, which may have been adopted in pursuance of delegated authority, are not sufficient to meet this evil?

Mr. GORE. I do say that complaints have come to me that the evil not only exists but that the evil is growing. I have here an abundance of testimony upon the subject. The famous wheat report of the New York State Legislature goes into the matter in detail. I have here extracts from the testimony, and I should like to have the letter at the desk read at this juncture. This is not a new thing; it not only exists, but is increasing in aggravation and seriousness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ALBANY, August 31, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS P. GORE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I understand you offered an amendment to the Agricultural bill, now pending, which is practically the same as the order of the New York State Food Commission, in relation to the adulteration of compounded stock feeds.

I want to thank you for having taken this course, as I believe it is right and just. I thought perhaps it would be possible to have a delegation in Washington at the hearing next Tuesday. However, it being primary day, it will not be possible to get the men I hoped to have appear.

I am sending you herewith the list of samples which were taken by the food commission of this State, showing the ingredients found by the chemist. There were also samples found which had not yet been mixed, which consisted of fanningmill tailings, composed principally of thistle heads, straw joints, light oats and barley, and chaff. This material was ground into fine state and mixed into feeds.

I certainly hope you will be able to procure the passage of the amendment.

Very truly, yours, C. R. WHITE.
Director Bureau of Cooperative Associations.

Approved:
EUGENE H. PORTER,
Commissioner of Foods and Markets.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, the resolutions of the New York Food Commission, upon which this amendment was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

Whereas the field of concentrated commercial feeding stuffs has been invaded with compounded and sugar-coated molasses feeds containing a large percentage of fiber, foreign and inner matter containing no food value, and the disappearance from the market of the United States of straight grain feeds known to the dairymen, we would recommend for your consideration the following rules and regulations concerning the material and ingredients contained in these feeds and would recommend that a copy of this resolution be mailed the Commissioner of Agriculture of the United States, the Hon. Herbert Hoover, Food Administrator of the United States, and the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Agriculture of the United States for their earnest consideration.

1. The use of any one or more of the following materials or ingredients in concentrated commercial feeding stuffs is declared to be an adulteration and the following materials or ingredients are declared to be adulterants:

Damaged feed.
Mill, elevator, or other sweepings or dust.
Buckwheat hulls.
Cottonseed hulls.
Peanut hulls.
Peanut shells.
Rice hulls.
Oat hulls.
Corncobs, ground.
Cocoa shells.
Clipped oat by-product.
Ground or unground hulls, screenings, chaff, or other cleanings derived from the preparation, cleaning, or milling of any seed or grain, when separated from the standard product, as an offal or by-product of such preparation, cleaning, or milling.
Humus.
Peat.
Spagnum moss.
Ivory nut turnings.
Ground cornstalks.
Flax-plant refuse.
Sorghum pulp.
Ground or shredded straw or hay.
Sawdust, cellulose, or dirt.

2. Concentrated commercial feeding stuffs adulterated by the addition of one or more of the materials enumerated in Rule 1, or any ingredient other than grain or a grain product, or any other adulterant, shall, when offered for sale in packages or containers in any State, be tagged or labeled, each package or container to have printed on it or attached to it a label or tag on which is plainly printed in addition to and in like form to the statement now required by law, the list of ingredients of such concentrated commercial feeding stuff, the number of pounds of each ingredient per unit; provided that the statement may be in terms of maximum and minimum content of each ingredient, the variation between such maximum and minimum to be not to exceed 15 per cent of the minimum as stated. If one or more of the ingredients of a concentrated commercial feeding stuff is a concentrated commercial feeding stuff, such ingredient or ingredients shall be subject to the same provisions and shall be separately stated.

3. In each and every case of a bulk sale in any State of a concentrated commercial feeding stuff adulterated by the addition of one or more of the ingredients enumerated in rule 1, or by an ingredient other than grain or a grain product, or by any other adulterant, there shall be delivered to the purchaser at the time of the sale a printed paper containing the information relative to the formula of such feed as specified in Rule 2.

4. In each and every case of a sale in any State in a package or container of a concentrated commercial feeding stuff adulterated by the use of any one of the ingredients enumerated in rule 1, or by any ingredient other than a grain or grain product, or by any other adulterant, so that the maximum crude fiber content of such concentrated commercial feeding stuff is 10 per cent or more or the minimum crude protein content of such concentrated commercial feeding stuff is 9 per cent or less, the statement provided for in rule 2 shall be printed on a black tag in white letters; and in each and every case of such a sale in bulk the statement provided for in rule 2 shall be printed on black paper in white letters; in all cases such letters to be in plain readable type of a size not less than 10 point, printer's measure.

5. Any retailer in any State who shall mix a concentrated commercial feeding stuff to a customer's order shall, when selling or offering the same for sale either in packages, containers, or in bulk, furnish the purchaser at the time of delivery of the same with a tag or printed or written statement of the ingredients used and the amount of each.

Mr. GORE. The resolution contains the enumeration referred to, including many foreign materials of which I had never previously heard mention made. I say it is a growing evil, because during the last year and a half, or since the mills have been under governmental control, they are not selling feedstuff, such as brans and shorts, to the farmer, but these commodities go through manufacturing concerns and are then sold to the farmers. The farmer can not buy them and mix his feed as he formerly did. This information has been brought to me; I can not vouch for it otherwise. The farmers can do it as well as can these manufacturing concerns, but they can not get the ingredients and so are obliged to buy this stuff. It is adulterated with various crude fibers and foreign materials that have absolutely no value whatever. The farmers are obliged to pay the freight, and they are obliged to pay the concentrated prices for this worthless trash.

I can see no reason why the interstate shipment of fraudulent feedstuff should not be interdicted by law. I realize that the Secretary of Agriculture must be vested with authority, that somebody must be given discretion to permit of the shipment of stuff containing admixtures that do not measurably detract from the feeding value of the substances; but there is no reason why this process should go forward without arrest and without hindrance. I ask to have printed, without reading, an analysis of various samples by the New York experiment station; I repeat that I can not myself understand it, and I doubt if anybody else can who has no technical knowledge on the subject. It seems to me with the provision that the Secretary of Agriculture can give written authority for the interstate shipment of these materials no injury can result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] I will perfect my amendment by adding the words "or bales" after the word "packages."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has a right to perfect his own amendment, and it will be perfected in the manner he suggests.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to say just one word on this matter before voting upon it. I think I shall vote in favor of the amendment, although under the present law an adulteration of any food article entering into interstate commerce is penalized and the Secretary of Agriculture not only has the authority to compel every manufacturer to file with him a statement of the ingredients constituting anything he may manufacture, but he also has authority, acting in conjunction with the Department of Justice, to have any carload lot or any packaged seized, condemned, and confiscated if it is adulterated in any manner.

I am a little afraid that possibly the restrictions proposed in this amendment go so far that it will be dangerous; but I shall not vote against the amendment, hoping and expecting that the Senator will be able to derive some benefit that is not already derivable through the present pure-food act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not this amendment will accomplish any good, but I have a great deal of sympathy with the idea which the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has in calling the attention of Congress to the great evil of adulteration which already exists. It is a notorious fact that everything which we buy in the shape of food for man or beast is very expensive. Such articles are expensive largely on the theory that there is a demand for all foodstuffs and that the supply is short. The ingenious dealer or manufacturer makes up the shortage by increasing the bulk through the use of weeds, sawdust, and other rubbish. We know that under the food regulations the by-products of grain which the farmer has been in the habit of receiving from the mill where he has taken his grain are no longer permitted to be obtained by him, because the mill no longer grinds as it did of old, but central manufacturing food-product concerns have been established. The ordinary farmer, therefore, who has heretofore obtained his animal feed stuffs from his own grain is denied that opportunity. He is compelled to buy this concentrated stuff and a large percentage of it is absolutely worthless. He is selling his wheat and at the same time he is buying in the feed stuffs he must purchase weed seeds and dirt at a robber's price.

If the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma does no more good than to call the attention of the Department of Agriculture, having in charge the administration of the pure-food law, to its duty in analyzing and passing upon the fraudulent stuff which is being sold to the people of the United States, it will have been worth while.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that the present law is perhaps sufficient if it were enforced. The fact of the matter, however, is that it is not enforced. Possibly enacting another law will not bring relief, but at least this debate and the passage of the amendment will call the attention of the department to the fact that Congress expects action.

In these days, when anything seems to go because of war times, all kinds of frauds are perpetrated upon the people. Foods and feeds are adulterated. Most things are cheapened in quality and increased in price. The very taxes which are placed upon manufacturers become in many cases a source of revenue to those upon whom they are levied and an added burden to the consumer, who not only pays the tax but the additional profit. I wish, sir, that some of the just epithets that are used in condemning alien enemies would be applied to those of our own countrymen who are taking advantage of the situation to rob their fellow men. Indeed, more than epithets should be applied. They should be outlawed by decent society and classed with the Nation's foreign enemies. I know that this adulteration practice is being indulged in. My attention has been called to it by farmers themselves, who have shown me that the stuff they have been obliged to buy to feed their hogs and cattle is practically worthless. Some one is obtaining vast sums of money for these adulterants, which ought to be eliminated from the market. I do not know, I repeat, whether this provision will afford a remedy, but I think it is high time that Congress expresses itself upon this evil. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has an amendment which he desires to offer. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Henderson	McKellar	Shafroth
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Sheppard
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Kellogg	New	Smoot
Cummins	Kendrick	Nugent	Sterling
Curtis	Kenyon	Overman	Sutherland
Dillingham	King	Penrose	Thomas
Fletcher	Kirby	Phelan	Townsend
France	Knox	Pittman	Trammell
Gore	Lenroot	Poindexter	Watson
Guion	Lodge	Pomerene	Wilfley
Hale	McCumber	Ransdell

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], is necessarily detained on official business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On yesterday I offered an amendment which I sent to the desk to be printed and lie on the table. The parliamentary inquiry I wish to make is whether that amendment will be considered as pending when the bill goes into the Senate without reoffering it now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will have to be offered in the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I give notice to that effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on page 6, at the beginning of line 4, I move to strike out the words "General administration of extension work, $35,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. On the same page, line 5, I move to strike out the item:

Extension work in the Northern and Western States, $134,200.

I desire to state in this connection that I find the items immediately following include—

County-agent work, $1,893,000; boys' and girls' club work, $382,000; home-demonstration work, $1,327,400.

And then in the general Agricultural appropriation bill which was passed only a few weeks ago there is an appropriation of more than a million dollars for similar work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there does not seem to be anyone looking after the bill; but no reason has been given by the Senator from Utah why his motion should be adopted. These items of appropriation are similar to the ordinary appropriations made for carrying on the normal work of the Department of Agriculture, and for the Senate to vote to strike out an item merely because a Senator rises and says he moves to strike out an item, without giving any reason why it should be stricken out and without anyone appearing to take charge of the bill or to explain why it should not be stricken out, seems to me to be a pretty reckless way of legislating.

Because the Senator is opposed, apparently, to appropriating a million dollars or so for boys' and girls' club work, at least if I can follow his argument, he moves to strike out an item of $134,000 for the extension work of the agricultural colleges. I fail to see the logic of that sort of a proposition. There is an agricultural college in the State of Washington which is doing a splendid service in its extension work. This character of service is a very important feature of the development of the agricultural interests of the State.

I am not called on to defend this bill, but some one ought to be here to explain the items in the bill. I assume that this appropriation has been estimated for and requested by the Department of Agriculture, and I say that the burden is on the Senator from Utah, if he moves to strike out an item, to show to the Senate that that item is not needed in the great work of extending the instruction carried on under the direction of the agricultural colleges of the country. It is an entirely different proposition from the county agents' work and the boys' and girls' clubs; it has nothing whatever to do with those items.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the rule just announced by the Senator from Washington, if not new, is dangerously unique. Under such rule an appropriation bill, prepared by some clerk or bureau or interested department, bears the seal of verity if not sanctity, and must be accepted and approved. If a Senator has the audacity to question any item in the bill it is a sufficient reply to say that it has been recommended by some agency of the Government. In other words, the bill or item itself exhibits its own genuineness and validity and constitutes proof that the amount it calls for should be taken from the Treasury of the United States. The burden of proof rests upon the Senator challenging any appropriation to show that it ought not to be passed.

I do not accept the rule so announced. In my opinion, it is safer for the Government and for the taxpayers to proceed upon the theory that no money should be taken from the public Treasury without there is a strong and satisfactory reason therefor, and that the individual or committee seeking an appropriation must make clear the grounds upon which it can be based.

I insist that any Senator has the right to challenge any item in an appropriation bill, and that the duty then rests upon the proponents of the measure to justify the taking of the people's money.

It would seem, in view of the manner in which this bill was prepared, that the course for which I am contending should be adopted. The burden ought to be placed upon the clerks or bureaus who prepared this bill to justify some of the provisions which I think indefensible before it secures the approval of this body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that is quite a severe characterization of the committee of the Senate which has reported this bill favorably. I think that I am announcing a pretty safe principle of legislation in saying that when the Senate, under an approved system of legislation, refers a bill to one of its great standing committees, and that committee reports out the bill, the Senate can assume, prima facie at least, that the appropriations contained in it are wise appropriations. I repeat—of course, I announce no rule in the matter, for there is no rule—that it is my opinion that the burden is on the Senator who moves to strike out an appropriation which has been favorably reported by a committee to give some reasons why it should be stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I see the chairman of the committee is now present, but I wish to say a word. The various items which are proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] were more or less carefully considered by a standing committee of the Senate. We went into their merits and demerits, and I do not think that there is one of these items that has not been recommended by the department and reasons given why it should be incorporated in the bill at this time and become a law.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit an inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. KING. Is there a single item in this bill that did not emanate from some bureau or clerk or some employee of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I can not answer "yes" to that question, because it is rather too sweeping; but I will say that the major portion of the bill came from those whose intimate association with the matters involved justified them in recommending to us what was essential for the welfare of the country. We as a committee could not go abroad in all the different sections of the country and know what was needed. We have appointed a certain department to do that, to make recommendations to us and to give the reasons for their recommendations that certain legislation should be passed. The committee, in view of the recommendations and investigations by the department to which the bill will go for administration and execution, have left these items in the bill. As the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has said, for a Senator to rise and object simply because an item carries an appropriation is not sufficient reason in my mind for the Senate to reject it, unless he can show that it involves an absolute waste of money without adequate return for the expenditure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that every one of the items that are contained in the third subdivision, which the Senator from Utah moves to strike out——

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, we have passed that, and I am directing attention now to an item on page 6.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought we were still dealing with the suggestion of the Senator that this would be taken up again in the Senate.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, that motion prevailed, and we had passed to the consideration of another section of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my friend from South Carolina supports the procedure, which I regard as unsound, and, indeed, dangerous, namely, that any measure taking money from the people, no matter how stupendous the amount, is presumed to be just and proper, and can not be questioned or attacked unless the objector can affirmatively show that the appropriation is improper.

I again insist this view is dangerous. Senators not members of the committee are not always in a position to know the facts regarding an appropriation. There may be a multitude of reasons why it should not be approved, but without opportunity for investigation, no matter how vulnerable the claim urged for the appropriation, it would be difficult to prove a negative and show that the appropriation is a theft or is improper. It would seem that where money is to be taken from the Treasury of the United States the facts justifying the appropriation should be established by those who are demanding the warrant for the money.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the department that recommends this appropriation did give to the committee the reasons for it; and after we discussed those reasons it seemed wise to the committee to allow it to remain in the bill at the suggestion of the department. The reasons that they gave seemed to us to be adequate.

Now the Senator from Utah asks that it be stricken out. If he gives the Senate convincing reasons why it should be stricken out, then of course the Senate should take his advice; but I maintain that the burden rests upon him to show why it should be stricken out when the files of the committee room will show the reasons which the department gave for asking that such parts of the bill as the department did ask to be incorporated in the bill should be made a part of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the net result of the defense offered by the Senator from South Carolina is that whenever any executive department or any clerk in a department suggests that an appropriation is proper then, if it is challenged in the Senate, it is a perfect defense to say that some clerk or some bureau recommended it. I deny that that is a correct principle to adopt in legislation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah can not fasten any such position as that on the Senator from South Carolina. When the department suggested the passage of this bill they gave the reasons, and we as a committee discussed the reasons. We went over them. Some we rejected; some we accepted. We rejected quite a good number, in spite of the question mark on the face of my good friend from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Those that we accepted we accepted because it seemed to us that the argument they gave justified their acceptance.

As I say, the reasons they gave are on file in the committee room. It does not make any difference whether the person recommending them is a subordinate or whether he is a chief. If he, in the execution of the duties devolving upon him as an appointee of the Secretary of Agriculture, gives us a good reason why a thing should be done, and it meets our judgment that it is a good reason, then we incorporate the item in the bill; but it should not be rejected simply because it may perchance come from a clerk or a subordinate. I do not know who originated this item, but all of them bore the sanction of the Secretary of Agriculture, so that he must have passed upon them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator a moment, with the permission of the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am interested in the argument of the Senator from South Carolina; but let us suppose that the committee is satisfied that the item ought to go in and reports it to the Senate, and no reason is given to the Senate why it was put in. We understand, of course, that the committee passed upon it; but does that relieve the committee from the burden of responsibility of showing why it is in there, if a Senator challenges it and moves to strike it out?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, no; Mr. President, I made no such claim. I am going upon the assumption that the Senator having the bill in charge, the chairman of the committee, would, upon the suggestion of anyone, give the reasons; and I think the reasons for nearly every paragraph or every section of this bill have been given. I understand from the chairman of the committee that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has the estimates here, and that he can give the reasons for the estimates. I am not arguing that simply because the committee has gone into the matter the chairman or the Senator having charge of the bill should not give the Senate the benefit of every reason that led the committee to adopt the present bill, section by section.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question. This whole fourth subdivision provides for these expenses:

General administration of extension work, $35,000; home-economics work, $25,000—

Then, passing this:

County-agent work, $1,893,000; boys' and girls' club work, $382,900; home-demonstration work, $1,327,400; extension work in the Southern States, $90,000; county-agent work, $1,333,815; boys' club work, $75,300; home-demonstration work, $803,385; in all, $6,100,000.

Now, my question is this: At a period when we are not only engaged in a desperate war, but also will be engaged in producing a bill which will inaugurate desperate measures to raise funds to carry on that war, it seems to me we might well hold these educational matters in abeyance during the continuance of the war. During the time when we are at our wits' ends to find money to finance our operations upon the battle front, it seems to me that many things that would be very valuable during peace periods could be well laid aside; and the Senator must remember that not only in this third subdivision but also in the fourth subdivision nearly all of the items are educational items. We have been appropriating for the last 20 to 25 years for education along that line. Could we not cease our educational work just for a few months, at least, when we are straining in every possible way to secure money to carry on this war, and save millions upon millions of dollars?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to suggest that within a few weeks we appropriated approximately $28,000,000 for the Agricultural Department to meet its expenses for the fiscal year 1919? By far the greater portion of this amount will be utilized in paying employees in the department just mentioned. This bill carries nearly $20,000,000 more for the purpose of doing practically the same character of work that is provided for in the other bill, so that we now propose to give to the Agricultural Department nearly $50,000,000 to be expended principally for "administrative work" and to pay salaries and expenses of thousands of persons now employed and to be employed by the Agricultural Department. In the general appropriation bill this department receives nearly $3,000,000 more than was appropriated for the year 1917. But the department is not satisfied with that; so this bill is thrust before us by the employees of the department, those whose power and authority would be increased if the bill becomes law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Instead of economizing, then, we are doubly as extravagant as we were prior to the war period.

Mr. KING. Absolutely; and the extravagance results in taking from other employment, useful and necessary, thousands of young men, some of whom should be upon the battle fields of France. It is this extravagance that I am protesting against, this multiplication of employees of the Government, until one gets sick at heart when he sees the tens of thousands, a veritable army, thronging Washington and filling the entire land. I am willing to vote for every dollar that is needed to stimulate agricultural production. I am ready to support any measure required by the farmers to enable them to meet the demands which the war places upon their shoulders. But I am not willing, when we need billions and must have billions to save our country and civilization, to vote money by the millions when the benefit is doubtful and when it is principally to enable a department to employ thousands of persons who are needed in various activities and in rendering military and naval service. I feel sanguine that the patriotic farmers of this land would not approve of this bill and are not asking for its passage. As I have said, they want help on the farm; this bill will result in diminishing the number available for work on the farm. It will make clerks and Government employees of thousands; it will keep out of the draft a large number, whose places will be filled by the boys of the farmers, and, indeed, in some cases the farmers themselves.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma, but I do not yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. There is not quite so much weight in the criticisms either of the Senator from Utah or of the Senator from North Dakota, when they are analyzed, as there seems to be at first blush.

Looking at the surface of this bill, it seems to duplicate a great deal of the service provided for in the regular appropriation bill. I think I can make that clear to the Senate. As just observed by the Senator from North Dakota, we have been expending money for a quarter of a century for the purpose of carrying on educational work. It has undoubtedly borne fruit. In the Southern States it originated in an effort to combat the spread and the ravages of the boll weevil. The particular crusade to which I now refer was instituted by former Secretary of Agriculture Wilson. He was a public benefactor—not only a special benefactor to the South, the section immediately concerned, but a benefactor to the United States and to the consumers of cotton everywhere.

During these 15 or 20 years an organization had been builded up in the Department of Agriculture to carry on the work. It was, indeed, a process of slow growth. It was a sort of evolution. When we entered the war we had a peace establishment to carry on this service, as we had a peace Military Establishment. It was suited to the requirements of peace, because it was gradually expanding, with a view ultimately to meeting the entire situation. That organization was all that we had when we entered the war. The battle cry was raised that "Food will win the war." No one can doubt that bread is just as essential as bayonets; and cotton is hardly less essential, both for clothing and for munitions. Munitions are as vital as men.

It was thought advisable to expand this peace establishment to meet the exactions and requirements of war. The regular Agricultural appropriation bill which passed both Houses several months ago carried an appropriation sufficient to meet the needs of the ordinary peace establishment, and to provide for the slow and normal growth. The predecessor of the pending bill was approved only August 10 of last year. It was intended to authorize the creation of a military establishment, the erection of a new organization. An organization has been, if not perfected, at least greatly advanced to carry forward the service provided for in this bill.

It is true that this bill carries an appropriation to expand the ordinary peace establishment where it is already in existence, where it is already in operation. It not only provides for the expansion of this organization where it already exists, it provides for the projection of the same system and the same organization into parts of the country where the peace organization had not yet penetrated. The service in the South bore one name, originating out of a boll-weevil crisis. The same service in the Northern and Western States bore a different name. The clubs in the South bore a different name from those in the North and West. That accounts for what is almost a duplication of names and an apparent duplication of service.

There have been county demonstrators appointed in some 2,100 counties in the United States. There are about 2,860 counties, taking the country as a whole. This bill proposes to expand the work and the activities of the demonstrators already provided for in the regular peace establishment. It intends to increase and expand their work, which calls for an increased appropriation. Not only that; it proposes to carry this work forward in counties where these demonstrators have not previously been appointed, and contains a provision apparently for the same purpose, but really for the projection of the work into new and unimproved fields.

I repeat that a great organization has been established throughout this country, the two principal objects of which are to emphasize the necessity of food conservation and the necessity of food production. Those are the two objects which this measure proposes to promote. The importance of neither one will be denied by any Member of the Senate.

I repeat, the predecessor of this bill was approved only August 10 of last year. It was desirable to keep the extraordinary organization, or the war organization, separate from the peace organization, to keep the war establishment segregated from the peace establishment, so that when the emergency passes we can discontinue this appropriation and can dismantle this extraordinary organization, so far as practicable and so far as desirable, without pulling to pieces the whole machinery or the whole system. That is the reason, that is the justification, for a special appropriation bill to meet the requirements of the Department of Agriculture, as distinguished from the regular appropriation bill. I think every Senator will appreciate the importance of keeping these two organizations, as far as possible, separated, so that in so far as it is purely an emergency organization it can be disestablished when the emergency passes.

The fact that this measure has been in operation and this organization in progress only one year places the committee under this disadvantage—a disadvantage which no Senator will underestimate: You must judge appropriations and policies requiring appropriations by their fruits, as you must judge a tree. This work has not been in progress long enough for it to have borne abundant fruit, either good or evil, or for the committee to place itself in a situation to report in detail as to the exact work carried forward under these different appropriations, and as to how far that work justifies the expenditure of money; but the whole object and the whole purpose of this bill is an effort to equip the country to meet the food crisis precipitated by this war.

The department has estimated for these various items. Not only the whole committee sitting in banc, but a subcommittee, scrutinized the provisions in connection with the estimates. As a rule, the estimates seemed to us to justify the expenditure of the money. There were some exceptions. There were instances where the committee disagreed with the department. We did not hesitate to advise the Senate to eliminate those appropriations. Some of those appropriations have been eliminated by the Senate. As a matter of course, the estimates came to us from the department. From the fact that the service is new, we are obliged to accept a great deal of it upon trust. There is no way for us, having no inspiration, to check and to countercheck the work as against the expenditure, and to reach a conclusion, as we might ordinarily reach a conclusion, as to the justified value of an appropriation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. For my own part, however—and I have no doubt that the same feeling exerted an influence upon the other members of the committee—this being designed to meet an emergency the existence of which no member of the committee doubted and no Member of the Senate will deny, and the lack of experience placing us in a position where we could not verify the appropriations in accordance with the experience and facts, as we can do in many instances, it was my disposition and I think the disposition of other members of the committee to resolve the doubt in favor of meeting the exigency, so that it could not be said hereafter, if we refused the appropriation, that the emergency could have been met had not the committee and the Senate dealt niggardly with this department; that the emergency could have been met, that the conservation and production of food could both have been stimulated, if the department had had the requisite funds for that object. The committee was not willing, lacking experience as it did, to assume the responsibility of resolving the doubt against providing the department with the necessary funds to stimulate conservation. We were not willing to resolve the doubt against equipping the department with funds to stimulate production. We thought it the part of prudence to place the department in a situation to carry forward this work which it had deemed essential, which it had deemed of sufficient importance to recommend to the Congress, and, as we conceived it, in the discharge of our public duty, in order to make assurance doubly sure.

I do not minimize the importance of economy; I do not encourage extravagance; but the committee thought it the part of prudence to make these appropriations, and to equip the department charged with this responsibility with sufficient funds to carry forward the work, not being willing hereafter to be charged with any dereliction of duty upon our own part. Economy which would deny us a sufficient food supply, or which would minimize the assurance of such a supply, is not to be recommended in a time when food is essential to our national existence.

I yield to the Senator from Texas. I think he addressed the Chair a moment ago.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I think perhaps it should also be stated that the House Committee on Agriculture held hearings on this bill and approved the items that came to the Senate from the House after the House had approved them.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me for just a moment, because he is peculiarly, I think, in possession of the knowledge which would enable him to answer my question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield, certainly.

Mr. FALL. A few moments ago, if I am correctly informed, the third paragraph of this bill was stricken out. Included in the items specified in the third paragraph there was an item for castor-bean culture which was stricken out without any question at all. Now, my impression is generally that the War Department has found it necessary to secure the cooperation of the Department of Agriculture in inducing the farmers throughout the different States of the Union to engage in the culture of the castor bean, because, as shown by a report of the Military Affairs Committee itself, the oil derived from the castor bean is absolutely necessary for use in all our airplanes; and I think the Senator will bear me out in the statement that in his State of Texas the department was successful in persuading the farmers to plant 100,000 acres in castor beans for the purpose of affording the United States Government a partial supply, at any rate, of the oil necessary for use in airplanes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FALL. I yield. Of course this is informal. I am trying to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I was attracted by the statement made by the Senator regarding the indispensable nature of castor oil in aviation. I think that impression was the outgrowth of a very optimistic article published in the Saturday Evening Post some time ago, where the same statement was made. The facts are that of the 20,000,000 gallons of lubricating oil demanded by the existing aviation program, it has been and will be impossible to secure more than 2,000,000 gallons of castor oil, the balance of it being made up of mineral lubricant, tests of which have shown it to be infinitely superior to castor oil. Castor oil is, however, indispensable to the lubrication of certain types of engines, known as rotary motors, of which the Le Rhone and the Gnome are, perhaps, the best illustrations. The Government is, of course, encouraging the cultivattion of the castor-oil bean and the production of castor oil, and can utilize all that can be secured.

Mr. FALL. That is the point I was making.

Mr. THOMAS. My impression is that the Government demand for castor oil is about the only incentive that the farmer needs to produce as much of it as he can; and the Government has used its facilities for the purpose of securing as much of the castor-oil bean as possible, and I think has induced the farmers of Texas, whose soil and climate are propitious for its cultivation, to go into the production of the castor-oil bean and castor oil on a very large scale.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Colorado very much. He is much more familiar with this matter than I am; but I was not basing the foundation for my question to the Senator from Texas upon the article in the Saturday Evening Post or any other magazine.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not mean to convey that impression. I meant to say, and thought I said, that the popular impression was doubtless derived from articles like that. I have no doubt the Senator's sources of information are more authentic.

Mr. FALL. One of the sources of my information I referred to in the question which the Senator did not catch; that is, that the matter of the necessity for the use of castor oil was referred to in this body through the report of a certain number, at least, of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Pursuing this subject, however, undoubtedly there has been a very large acreage in castor beans planted through the request, the suggestion—I might say the urgent suggestion—of the Government of the United States. The point I am making, and upon which I want to draw out the answer of the Senator from Texas, is that in this third paragraph an item of $20,000, I think, for instruction in castor-bean culture was stricken out without any question, without any discussion, without any hesitation, I might say, by a majority of the Senate, when the department itself gives the facts which I have just narrated—for instance, that it has secured the planting of a large acreage, and that those who planted it insisted that the department itself should furnish them with instructors, and that the amount asked is for the purpose of complying with these requests, and furnishing instructors.

Am I not correct in the statement I have made of the matter?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct; and I shall be glad at this time, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, to read what the Department of Agriculture says upon this subject.

Mr. KING. On the subject of castor beans?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. FALL. I simply mention that as one item. I will state later the point I am undertaking to make.

Mr. KING. That is so unimportant, and perhaps it may be defended, that if the Senator from Texas desires to put it in the RECORD I have no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think the Senate would like to know what the Department of Agriculture has to say on this subject.

Mr. FALL. I think we are entitled to the information, because—if the Senator will allow me again—I have seen this debate go on to this length, the items that have been voted upon have been explained by members of the committee to the Senators present and the vote of the Senate taken upon them, and then other Senators who were not here, who listened to none of the debate and none of the explanation, come in and renew the debate, and then insist that no information at all has been given them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is undoubtedly true. I want to say to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] that it has been stated repeatedly during the pendency of this bill that the Department of Agriculture, through the Secretary, has carefully explained every item in this bill. I have here in the document before me these explanations. I have heretofore presented a number of the explanations, and am ready to give an explanation at any time of any item about which any question is asked. But it seems useless to repeat assurances. As the Senator from New Mexico says, assurances will be given by members of the committee one day that all the estimates have been presented and explained in the regular way and the next day the whole debate is reopened as if no statement of that kind had been made by a member of the committee.

Now, I desire to read to the Senate what the department says:

> The oil of the castor bean has been found to be particularly desirable in the lubrication of airplane motors. It happens to be one of the few oils not soluble in gasoline and is affected but little by changes in temperature. It is therefore particularly useful in these motors. To meet the war needs in this direction the War Department has found it necessary to contract for the growing of about 100,000 acres of castor beans, and the assistance of this department has been requested in supervising the agricultural work incidental to the production of the crop.
> While formerly an important crop in certain sections of Oklahoma, Kansas, Missouri, and Illinois, the culture of castor beans has been practically abandoned in this country in recent years. The large planting required will have to be undertaken by growers who have little or no knowledge of the special features of the cultivation and handling of the crop. The work will be distributed over a wide area in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, and California.

The Senate will see that not only in Texas but in a number of other States arrangements have been made for the production of the castor bean. Now, the department proceeds:

> In order to give effective assistance, this large field should be divided into not less than five districts, in each of which the services of a skilled agronomist should be provided to follow up closely the plantings of castor beans which are being made under Government contracts and supply the necessary advice and instructions to farmers and farm demonstrators, contractors, county agents, and others concerned. It is planned (1) to insure, so far as possible, the proper handling of the crop, in order to give the highest degree of certainty of obtaining the needed product, and (2) to acquire practical detailed data regarding the best varieties to plant, the most suitable regions for planting, and the most desirable methods of handling the crop, in order to protect the interests of the Government should it become necessary to produce another crop of castor beans.

Mr. President, this item ought to be reinstated. It bears a vital and significant relation to the national defense.

Let me say right here that this entire bill is intended to provide especially for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture. It is itself a war measure, and these appropriations are to carry out authorizations that were established by the Senate in August, 1917. These appropriations are not duplicates of others; they are made in addition to those carried in the annual Agriculture appropriation bill.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Does this appropriation as proposed look to the future or to the past? As I understand it, the present castor bean crop is already made. I saw about 100 acres of beans in July that were 5 or 6 feet high. The people who had planted the crop seemed to understand how to cultivate it, and it is to be gathered, I understand, this month. All the provision has already been made for the production of the crop that is now produced and is being gathered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. So far as the present crop is concerned, that is true.

Mr. KIRBY. Then why should not the people who have produced the present crop know how to produce the next one? This is a very large expenditure of money.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is not a large expenditure. It is only $15,000 or $20,000. This work should be continued. I move to reconsider the vote by which that item was stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not in order now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not yield the floor, but permitted the Senator from Oklahoma and other Senators to propound certain questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has just stated that the purpose of this bill is to stimulate agriculture. We do not need to stimulate agriculture now. It is being stimulated. What the farmer wants now is man power. He is more interested in getting men to aid him in harvesting his crop than in getting clerks from the departments in Washington to pay periodic visits to his habitat. The farmers are working not 8 hours a day, but 16 and 18 hours each day. They are bearing heavy burdens in this crucial hour. The high prices which they are compelled to pay for clothing, agricultural implements, and labor absorb the amounts received from the sale of their products. They are suffering from a shortage of labor, and when the new draft law is put into effect their distress will be greatly increased. This bill hurts and does not help the farmer.

It will increase their taxes, but will not decrease their burdens. If the farmers of a single State in this Union will say, after they have examined this bill and know its provisions, as well as the provisions of the general appropriation bill, carrying $28,000,000, that this bill is needed and will aid them and the country in winning the war, I will support it.

I might say in passing, Mr. President, that there have been exempted under existing law a large number of men who are employed in the Agricultural Department. I have been informed by some that the number already exempted aggregates several thousand. Other gentlemen have told me that the number is about 2,000.

It is also asserted by some that if this bill should pass approximately 11,000 more young men who ought to be in the Army will be exempted from military service. We take the boys from the farm, and under the new law we will take the fathers from the farm who are under 45 years of age and send them to the trenches, but we propose by this bill to provide that thousands of additional young men, who, it will be claimed, have such superior qualifications along agricultural lines that they should not be drafted, will be put in such a class that they will be exempt from the military duty which they owe to their country at this hour.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. SHEPPARD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The morning paper announced, I think not only this morning but two or three days ago, the daily arrival in Washington of 500 people to take places in Government employ, and the Senator's criticism reminded me of that circumstance. Assuming that to be true, I should like to ask the Senator if he can imagine what so many extra employees are needed for in the city of Washington at this time?

Mr. KING. The same question has been propounded to me a number of times, and I have been utterly unable to furnish a satisfactory reply.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand they are coming so fast or employed in such numbers that frequently those in a building have to go out in order to make places for those who are coming in. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. KING. I think it is a matter that ought to receive attention at the hands of Congress. I have been told by some in the Government service that they will need 30,000 more clerks and employees in the departments in Washington. I can not understand the necessity of swelling the already mighty tide by adding to it a list of 30,000 more.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I was told to-day that it required the services of six clerks for 30 hours to telegraph to relatives and friends the names of the 300 victims of the San Diego disaster. That is very rapid work.

Mr. KING. Those of us who visit the departments, I think, are justified in stating that many of those in the employment of the Government utterly fail to give a proper return for the money they are taking from the Treasury of the United States.

The Senator from Texas, I understand from a sotto voce remark which he made, is inclined to controvert the position I have just taken with respect to the number of those who will be exempted from military service under the operation of this bill if it should become a law. If my information is wrong, I should be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. This bill does not exempt anyone. It could not exempt anyone. Men are exempted under the draft law, and no employee in the Agricultural Department or any other department of the Government has been exempted except by the application of that law by the local board to his case.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Texas has not answered the statement I made a moment ago.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill does not exempt anybody from military service and can not.

Mr. KING. What I said was, if this bill shall become a law it will lead to the exemption of 11,000, who will be withdrawn from military service and sent out under the operation of this bill to perform the work therein provided.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. KING. I hope I am mistaken, but I have the authority of the Member of the House who has made a very full investigation respecting this bill, a member of the Agricultural Committee, a man in whose judgment I have very great confidence and upon whose word I would rely.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. This bill does not change the draft law in any particular.

Mr. KING. Of course it does not change the draft law, but the Senator knows that under the interpretation placed upon the draft law there have been hundreds and thousands of men employed in the Agricultural Department who have been exempted from military service.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If they have been exempted, it has been because the men in charge of the local board exempted them. The Department of Agriculture has not exempted them, and no law that we have enacted outside the draft law has exempted them.

Mr. KING. The claim has been made that their services were indispensable and they have been exempted from military service.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The local board had to find that to be true.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KING. In just a moment It matters not the modus operandi by which they secure their exemption. The fact is that they have been exempted, and the fact will be that if this bill shall become a law thousands more of employees will be exempted from military service under the same interpretation which is placed on the draft law. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I think I can say that these exemptions depend very largely upon the position which may be taken by the head of the department. In some of the departments they have been rather free in asking for exemptions. In others they absolutely refuse to grant them. Just this morning I was told that one of the collectors in my own State up to date had refused to ask to have any one of his men exempted, because he felt that though they were doing good service, if the country needed them at the front he could get some one else to take their places.

Mr. KING. I assert now upon the information to which I have referred, which was conveyed to me, that there are thousands of young men within the military age who are qualified physically and otherwise to be doing service upon the battlefield who have been exempted from military service because they were employed in the Agricultural Department. This bill calls for the employment not of hundreds but of thousands of young men, and under the general Agricultural bill there are many thousands of persons employed. Where are we to obtain the young men to fill the demands of this bill? Nearly $20,000,000 are called for by the bill. The greater part of that sum is to be expended in paying salaries and compensation of employees and clerks and agencies of the Government. I do not think that 25 per cent, indeed I do not think that 10 per cent, of this vast sum will be devoted to any service other than paying the compensation of those who will be employed under the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to suggest to the Senator that there was testimony before us of an expert chemist—and chemists are very much needed by the department—who was in camp peeling potatoes. I think the Senator must realize that under the selective-draft law that chemist instead of peeling potatoes should have been in the Department of Agriculture doing the work of a chemist. I think the Senator will find that all those exemptions are requested first by the Secretary of Agriculture. In fact, he goes over every one of them personally, and the principle we are following is that of exempting from the service men who will do more good making gases to kill Germans than they could possibly do in the trenches. I think the Senator is wrong as to the number of exemptions. The testimony will show that there have been very few exemptions in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago I say to my friend, I hope I am wrong, but I feel persuaded that the figures I stated are well within the realm of accuracy. It has been a matter of surprise to me, if I may be permitted to further say to my friend from Iowa, to see the number of men who feel that they are better fitted for some particular work that does not put them in the trenches at this time.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to say to the Senator further that the testimony was that no man who requested any exemption was granted one. The Secretary refuses to indorse the application of any man in the Department of Agriculture who asks for an exemption. In fact, most of them want to go and it is hard to keep them for the necessary work of the department. I think in fairness that ought to be said at this time.

Mr. KING. I would not do any injustice to any of our splendid young men, but it is a fact that there are some who are very anxious to obtain commissions in the Quartermaster's Department or in some branch of the military service where they will not be required to come into active contact with our foes upon the battle front.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. The fact still remains if we pass a bill which requires the Secretary of Agriculture to employ 10,000 more men, and if those 10,000 are within the draft age, he will necessarily, in order to carry out the law, have to call for the exemption of that number of persons.

Mr. KING. That, of course, is the important point under consideration.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Let me continue for a moment and then I shall be very glad to yield to my friend from New Mexico.

The bill does call for a large number of additional employees. They must be obtained somewhere. Judging from the character of those in the service of the department it is apparent that they will be young men within the draft age, because as a rule that is the class of men now employed in the Agricultural Department. If the thousands of men required under the provisions of this bill are procured, they must come from other lines of employment and other fields of activity, and to that extent this bill will prove injurious rather than advantageous. It will take them from other needed service or will keep them from the Army, and their places will have to be filled in the Army by farmers' sons or other citizens. I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Probably it would be better to wait until the Senator has concluded, but I may call his attention, if he will allow me, to the fact that this bill does not provide for the employment of additional men, and that it is not a bill standing by itself at all. The bill which provides for the employment of these men was a direct authorization by the Congress of the United States which became a law on August 10, 1917, and for which I think the Senator voted along with the balance of us to increase food production. The bill here is a bill following it, providing the appropriation for carrying it out; nothing more nor less, as is shown in the title. The bill that we are now discussing is "to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.'" That act, as I said, became a law August 10, 1917. It authorizes distinctly the employment of a certain number of additional men. It authorizes the employment of two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, for example, fixing their salaries, and all that. It authorizes certain work to be done, and it is specifically provided what is the law now with reference to exemptions. I will read from page 275 of the Fortieth Statutes from the act to which this is an amendment in the nature of providing appropriations for carrying it out:

Provided, That the employment of any person under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any such person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], justifying this bill, says that it provides for new machinery, that the general machinery of the Agricultural Department was not adequate to meet the exigencies of the war, and that a new machine had to be set up and manned and lubricated and put into operation. It seems to me that that is a very unwise method of dealing with the situation, assuming that additional machinery is required. It would be better to expand the organization authorized by law rather than create a parasitic organization.

Mr. FALL rose.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

Mr. FALL. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator again to the fact that we provided this machinery in addition to the regular machinery of the Agricultural Department in the act to which I referred.

Mr. KING. I understand.

Mr. FALL. We did not make any appropriation in that act to carry it out. These are appropriations for carrying out the act, for which I think the Senator voted, as I did.

Mr. KING. The point I was trying to make was that the Senator from Oklahoma justifies this bill and its predecessor upon the ground that the exigencies of the war required additional machinery. I submit, Mr. President, that if more employees were required by the department growing out of the war it would have been better to have added to the list of employees and to enlarge the authority of the department already in existence, rather than to create a new machine.

But, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico, I want to state that even if under the bill of 1917, of which it is claimed this bill is supplementary, the thousands of employees are already in service, it is manifest that if this bill is not passed they will go back to private life, to the duties and labors for which they are fitted, and many of them will enter the military and naval service of the United States. Whether the Government has the thousands of employees now in the Agricultural Department or will be compelled under this bill to procure others, the principle is the same. It means if this bill becomes a law that thousands of men will be spending the greater part of this appropriation, instead of being in some productive and needed work or in the Army or the Navy.

But the point I rose more particularly to animadvert upon was this: My contention is that the general appropriation bill, and I have adverted to this once or twice before, carries adequate appropriations to deal with all the items that are provided for in the pending bill. For instance, as I have said before, the appropriation carries nearly $28,000,000. I will say in passing that to find sufficient competent men to efficiently administer that bill will be a Herculean task upon the part of the Agricultural Department. If the Agricultural Department can find sufficient competent and skilled men to properly spend this $28,000,000 during the fiscal year of 1919 it will have discharged a very important duty and will deserve the thanks of the people of this country.

I am not criticizing legitimate and proper appropriations for the Agricultural Department. I have sometimes felt that we have neglected the agricultural interests of our country and have been too solicitous for the welfare of the manufacturing and other interests. Agriculture needs the fostering care of the Republic, and it needs fair and proper treatment at the hands of Congress and at the hands of the State governments. But I am protesting in this hour of war, when we are experiencing difficulty in obtaining sufficient revenues to meet the appropriations imperatively demanded by the war, against saddling upon the people unnecessary burdens and appropriating money that is not absolutely necessary.

As I indicated a moment ago, the farmers to-day are chiefly concerned in securing labor to harvest and save their crops. They are not demanding $20,000,000 to pay the salaries of a class of clerks and peripatetic scientists with a Government seal upon them. We provided liberally in the general appropriation bill, and the items there are sufficient to meet all the provisions of the bill which is now under consideration. We have already provided millions of dollars for legitimate and necessary aid to be rendered the farmers by the Department of Agriculture.

For instance, I find on the sixth page of the general Agricultural bill, carrying nearly $25,000,000, $221,660 appropriated "to investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and of farm practice."

For the general administration of the office of the Secretary we appropriated $462,000.

For salaries, office of Farm Management, we appropriated $83,430.

The total for the office of the Secretary of Agriculture was $767,090, and practically every cent of that is for salaries.

Then for the Weather Bureau we appropriated for salaries and traveling expenses $1,912,930.

For the Bureau of Animal Industry, and this amount is substantially, or practically all of it, consumed by the salaries of the employees of the department, we appropriated $4,079,588.

Under the heading of "Bureau of Plant Industry" we find appropriations aggregating $3,137,038. The greater portion of that amount is for the compensation of employees.

For the Bureau of Plant Industry, for investigating fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, tobacco, vegetables, and all sorts of agricultural products, $441,000.

For the investigation of plant diseases and pathological collections, $62,020.

For the investigation of diseases of orchards and other fruits we appropriated nearly $76,000, $8,000 of which amount "shall be available for the investigation of diseases of the pecan."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that for the item of $441,000 we have already appropriated. It has been used largely and the $62,000 is additional.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, we have not used it. The testimony upon which the appropriation was predicated was given before we made the appropriation for the item to which I just called the Senator's attention.

Mr. FALL. I will call the Senator's attention to it later.

Mr. KING. Then for investigation of citrus trees, $250,000.

For the investigation of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, and so forth, $83,000.

For applying methods of eradication or control of the white-pine blister rust, and so forth, $230,448.

For the investigation of diseases of cotton, potatoes, truck crops, forage crops, drug and related plants, $87,800, and under that heading will be found appropriations for the investigation of plant life, the diseases of plants, trees, grasses, and so forth, for which an enormous appropriation was made. The very items that are covered in the pending bill are provided for in the appropriation bill which we passed a few weeks ago.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will yield one moment I will attempt to make myself clear. The bill as introduced is entitled, designated, and intended to carry out the provisions of the act of August 10, 1917. In the act of August 10, 1917, there were certain appropriations made for certain specific purposes—lump appropriations. Under the provisions of that act those appropriations expire on a certain date, and I will read it to the Senator if he desires me to do so. They have no application to the appropriations made in the regular annual Agricultural appropriation bill. For instance, the item which the Senator just read, in which he undertook to show that I was in error in calling his attention to it, for the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products, $441,000, the following sums are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to be available immediately and until June 30, 1918. These are supplemental appropriations which are asked for to make good, as I understand it, the $62,000 to prevent a deficiency.

Mr. KING. I do not understand that there is any deficiency. If there is a deficiency, then obviously the Department of Agriculture did something that it ought not to have done under the law.

Mr. FALL. I made an error possibly in using the word; I am not even a member of the committee, but every item in the bill is estimated for, and there is some justification for it. To say there is none is simply to say that is the legal conclusion, I suppose, or else that the Senator making the statement has not read the justifications as they are printed and laid upon the desk of Senators, a copy of which I have, showing the data for this bill.

Mr. President, I am one of those who believed when we passed the original bill, which was passed on the same day as the food-conservation bill, under which Mr. Hoover holds authority, that the first was just as necessary as the latter bill, and that agriculture is just as necessary to carry on this war as are our munition plants and as are our war supply factories or as is any other possible industry, including debates in the United States Senate.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, there can not be any controversy in respect to the proposition last announced by the Senator from New Mexico. A Senator would convict himself of idiocy if he were to stand here and assert that the interests of agriculture are not important. I have frequently said that the interests of agriculture are paramount. It has been said, and no one has contradicted it, that we can not win the war unless we have an adequate food supply. I stated yesterday that we have not only to provide food for ourselves and for our soldiers, but, in part, that we have to supply food for the allies. The point I am making——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Texas will pardon me just a moment, the point I am trying to emphasize is that we have appropriated liberally, we have appropriated nearly $28,000,000, for the coming year for the Agricultural Department, and if it spends that amount economically and efficiently, if it employs the right character of men, and if it does all that it ought to do to carry out the letter and the spirit of the appropriation, it will have performed a gigantic task, and it will have exhausted all of the man power that it ought to take from the various other field of activity for the purpose of utilizing it in its field of operation.

Now I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if he did not vote for the act which was approved August 10, 1917?

Mr. KING. I do not recall whether I voted for it or not; probably I did. I remember that there was an insistent demand at that time that we had to do something to stimulate agriculture; the statement was made that the appropriations which had been made for the Agricultural Department did not take into account some of the requirements of the country; and I have no doubt that the appropriation bill which was then pressed through was deemed by Senators to be wise. I am not attacking or defending the appropriation at that time, although I believe that it was wholly unnecessary.

However, let me say in passing that, in addition to the appropriation there made, we gave to the agency of the Government with which Mr. Hoover is identified a very large sum. That agency has spent millions of dollars for the food-conservation propaganda, and it has been very effective in many instances throughout our land. In addition to the millions spent by Mr. Hoover's organization and the millions spent under the general Agricultural appropriation act of last year, we have given $28,000,000 for the fiscal year 1919; and I am protesting against duplicating the appropriation therein contained and withdrawing from the field of endeavor and activity a large number—probably thousands—of persons who ought to be employed in industrial pursuits or they should be serving our country upon the battle field.

I want to call attention briefly to some of these other items carried in the general appropriation bill. We appropriated $2,454,698 for the Bureau of Plant Industry. Senators will remember that neither this sum nor the $28,000,000 has been expended; these amounts are now available and the Department of Agriculture can utilize them for the stimulation of agriculture and for the promotion of the interests of the agriculturists of this country.

For the Forest Service we appropriated $5,731,555. For the Bureau of Chemistry there was appropriated $1,243,391. Let me say that the greater part of that appropriation is for the payment of employees of the Government. I want to call attention to one or two other items.

For collaboration with other departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations and whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work, $14,000;

For investigating the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and for inspecting the same before shipment when desired by the shippers or owners of these products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before the said products are allowed to be sold therein; and for all necessary expenses in connection with such inspection and studies of methods of analysis in foreign countries, $4,280;

For investigating the preparation for market, handling, grading, packing, freezing, drying, storing, transportation, and preservation of poultry and eggs, and for experimental shipments of poultry and eggs within the United States, in cooperation with the Bureau of Markets and the Bureau of Animal Industry, $40,000;

For investigating the handling, grading, packing, canning, freezing, storing, and transportation of fish, and for experimental shipments of fish, for the utilization of waste products, and the development of new sources of food, $14,000;

For investigating the packing, handling, storing, and shipping of oysters and other shellfish in the United States and the waters bordering on the United States, $5,000;

For the biological investigation of food and drug products and substances used in the manufacture thereof, including investigations of the physiological effects of such products on the human organism, $15,000;

For the study and improvement of methods of utilizing by-products of citrus fruits; and the investigation and development of methods for determining maturity in fruits and vegetables, in cooperation with the Bureau of Plant Industry and the Bureau of Markets, $13,000;

For investigation and experiment in the utilization for coloring purposes of raw materials grown or produced in the United States, in cooperation with such persons, associations, or corporations as may be found necessary, including repairs, alterations, improvements, or additions to a building on the Arlington Experimental Farm, $70,720;

For the investigation and development of methods for the manufacture of table sirup, $7,000—

The amount of $589,081 was appropriated—

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, or misbranded, or poisonous, or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

And so forth.

"For investigating the grading, weighing, handling, transportation," and so forth, of naval stores $10,000 was appropriated.

For the Bureau of Soils we appropriated $491,235; and the greater part of that is for salaries. The appropriation provides for the investigation of soils and their classification.

The bill carries an appropriation for the Bureau of Entomology of $986,680. I might say, in passing, that substantially all of that is devoted to the payment of the salaries of the employees who will spend their time in investigating insects in connection with cereals, forage crops, tobacco, rice, and so forth. For preventing the spread of moths $304,050 was appropriated. For the Bureau of Biological Survey the bill carried an appropriation of $586,350. It also carries large appropriations for the Bureau of Crop Estimates; and I see, by the way, in the bill under consideration a large appropriation for the same purpose.

In the general appropriation bill, under the head of Bureau of Markets, there is an appropriation of $2,023,255, and I find in the bill now under consideration an appropriation for the same purpose.

For the enforcement of the insecticide act in the general appropriation there is provided $121,240.

For demonstrations on reclamation projects there is an appropriation of $48,600. For experiments in dairying and in live stock there is an appropriation of $40,000. For the eradication of pink bollworm there is a large appropriation. To make surveys in regard to the distribution of the pink bollworm $25,000 has been appropriated. To investigate in Mexico and elsewhere the pink bollworm there is an appropriation of $25,000.

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with individuals or corporations with regard to the dehydration of vegetables, and so forth, and disseminating information concerning the same, $250,000 is appropriated.

And so on, Mr. President, until, as I have said, we have an appropriation bill enormous in amount—$3,000,000 more than for the preceding year—which covers all that the agriculturists of the country will require at this time, and more, in my opinion, than the Department of Agriculture will be enabled to spend in a wise and judicious way.

The pending bill, as I said yesterday, in my opinion, contains many provisions that are improper—duplications of appropriations which have already been made. It is time that we should practice economy; that our voices should be raised in defense of the Treasury and the taxpayers. It is an ungracious task to attack appropriations, and defeat is the usual result. But I feel that every effort should be made to protect the Treasury and to provide for the demands—which must be met—made under the military necessities of the hour. Even if misunderstood, I shall oppose appropriations not imperative, but will cheerfully vote whatever is needed for our soldiers and sailors and to enable our country to carry to a successful issue the titanic struggle in which it and the allied nations are engaged.

Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be stated and that a vote be taken.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I desire to say just two or three words, and then I shall have nothing more to say upon this bill or upon any provision of it. It is useless to explain one moment what an item is and what the justification for it is, and then have some Senator who has been out of the Chamber and who has not heard the explanation return to the Chamber and renew a motion to strike it out and then say he has had no information as to why he should vote for it. So, as it is not incumbent upon me to defend this bill in any way, as it is not of one cent's interest to the people in New Mexico whom I represent in part, if I took a selfish point of view, I should simply retire to the smoking room and console myself with a cigar while motions to strike out are being made because some other Senator does not give the particular Senator who is then upon his feet certain information that he wants as to why items should not be stricken out.

So far as I am concerned, I have no responsibility in connection with the bill. I am not a member of the committee. I am, however, a Member of the Senate. I assisted in doing what I thought was best for the country in voting for the passage of both the food-production bill and the food-and-fuel bill, which became laws, I think, on the same day exactly—on August 10, 1917, I believe. I believed then, and I now believe, that one was more necessary than the other; that is, that the first bill approved—the food-production bill—was much more necessary than the other, necessary as it was and as well as it has been administered.

Agriculture has been recognized by the President and by the Senate by an overwhelming majority to be a great war necessity. It has been recognized by every one, and, I may say, by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I think, that it is necessary to increase the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture if we desire to increase production, just exactly as it was necessary to increase the expenditures of the War Department over the peace expenditures if we desired properly to equip our men and win this war.

The Senator from Utah has referred upon several occasions to the fact that the great regular agricultural appropriation bill—the peace agricultural bill, the bill providing the necessary funds for carrying along the Agricultural Department and its general development under peace conditions—was $3,000,000 more than it had been before. I defy the Senator to show that any regular appropriation bill for any other department of this Government during the war time has not been many times more than $3,000,000 above the peace appropriation.

Yet the Senator agrees with me in announcing that he firmly believes that agriculture is a war necessity and that the production of agricultural products should be stimulated in every way possible.

That was the purpose of the legislation adopted a year ago. In that legislation, which was of a general character, it not being an appropriation bill but a general bill to stimulate production, there were certain specific appropriations made, one of which I have referred to. There was a specific provision with reference to the specific appropriations that they should expire on June 30, 1918. It is to supplement those appropriations and to carry them out, and also to carry out the other purposes for which the Senate provided and the duties which Congress directed the Secretary to perform, that further appropriations are asked.

I am going to read into the RECORD now, for the purpose of clearing up this muddled condition, the first two sections of the bill, to which I have referred. They are as follows:

That, for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and carrying on the war with Germany by gathering authoritative information concerning the food supply, by increasing production, by preventing waste of the food supply, by regulating the distribution thereof, and by such other means and methods as are hereinafter provided, the powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are conferred and prescribed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements and machinery, and any article required in connection with the production, distribution, or utilization of food. It shall be the duty of any person, when requested by the Secretary of Agriculture, or any agent acting under his instructions, to answer correctly, to the best of his knowledge, under oath or otherwise, all questions touching his knowledge of any matter authorized to be investigated under this section.

Then there are fines provided for the punishment of anyone failing to act under the instructions of the Secretary, failing to answer questions, or failing to give information which he is entitled to demand.

SEC. 3. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to purchase, or contract with persons to grow such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them to farmers for cash, at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

He did contract under the authority vested in him with farmers, for instance, to raise castor beans, yet cheerfully the Senator comes in here and, without investigation of any kind or character and without giving the Senate any reason for the amendment, moves to strike out an item to authorize the Secretary to pay the necessary expenses in carrying out the power vested in him by the Senator's own vote. That is the manner in which this bill has been treated from its very inception. No consideration of any kind or character of a proper nature has been given to the items, but the great Department of Agriculture has been held up to ridicule and to abuse by Senators upon the theory that they, forsooth, are the watchdogs of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely desire to bring out the point that in the bill from which the Senator has just read we appropriate several million dollars in lump sums.

Mr. FALL. Exactly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And there was not any question raised about the appropriations at all.

Mr. FALL. None at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This bill is to carry out the purposes of that act, as the Senator has stated, but instead of appropriating lump sums to do the work, we specify what each item shall be used for.

Mr. FALL. Precisely.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Probably if we had put these items in a lump sum they would have gone through without anyone raising objection.

Mr. FALL. Exactly. Millions of dollars, as the Senator has said, were voted in lump sums; $441,000 for a certain purpose was voted by those who voted for that bill in one lump sum, while the Senator from Utah is now objecting to an item of $62,000 for the same purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will call attention, with the Senator's permission, to one lump-sum item in the act to which he has referred, as follows:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others, $4,348,400.

Mr. FALL. Precisely; and the Senator from Utah is now moving to strike out an item of $134,000 for an exactly similar purpose after having voted last year for over $4,000,000. The estimate and the justification show that the amount of the immediate item under consideration is $33,000 more than the estimate of last year; but it is for another war year and for additional war work and to aid in the production of food for our soldiers.

Mr. President, I shall have nothing more to say upon the subject. I shall simply vote against what I regard as—well, I will not characterize as I had intended, but will vote against the motions to strike out the different items embraced in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah to strike out the provision which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 5, it is proposed to strike out "extension work in the Northern and Western States, $134,200."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to strike out.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the Director General of Railroads is authorized and directed to supervise or to take possession and assume control of any stockyards, stock cars, refrigerator cars, or any cold-storage establishment through which packing or other food products are distributed, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war and for a period of 21 months thereafter.

That just compensation shall be made for such supervision, possession, control, or operation, to be determined by said Director General of Railroads with the approval of the President; and if the amount thereof so determined is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation or the lawful police regulations of the several States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator who offers the amendment if the President does not have all this authority now?

Mr. GORE. I rather think so.

Mr. KENYON. Does this amendment confer any additional power than the power the President now has?

Mr. GORE. It authorizes the Director General of Railroads to take over the utilities.

Mr. KENYON. Does it direct or authorize him to do so?

Mr. GORE. Both.

Mr. KENYON. It authorizes and directs?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. Then it does go further than the power which was conferred on the President in the food bill?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that this is rather too important an amendment to be run through without some consideration and discussion. I had no idea that such an amendment was to be offered. I have had no opportunity to examine it, and I believe that there ought to be some opportunity afforded us to look at an amendment of this magnitude. It has not been recommended by the committee.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I wish to inquire who moves this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what reason there is for this proposed amendment at this particular time?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that the amendment is based to some extent on the report of the Federal Trade Commission, although it does not go as far as the recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission. That commission, as the Senator is aware, recommended that these utilities be taken over by the Government, title to them acquired, and that they should be operated permanently as a Government monopoly. That raises a question which has not been raised in connection either with the telegraph or telephone lines or the railroads, a question which has been adjourned to the future, but which will undoubtedly come up in a separate bill at an early date.

There are a great many reasons set forth by the Federal Trade Commission, and a great many reasons which will suggest themselves to Senators apart from that report in favor of the Government operation of stockyards, cattle cars, and refrigerator cars, particularly while the railroads are under Government supervision and control.

The primary and paramount object of this amendment is to some extent to bring under effective control the packing-house concerns.

The provision is temporary; it is limited to the period during which the railroads shall be under governmental control. It does not propose to acquire these properties, to take title, or to adopt this policy as a permanent one. Such provision will undoubtedly be made in the bill which is to come up at an early date; but the early adjournment of the present session of Congress will render, I think, the passage of a bill of that sort impossible at this session, and, as this session is to be followed by a short session, it will probably be impossible to pass it at the short session; but a limited measure of this sort, it seemed to me, might secure a considerable measure of relief and still adjourn those other questions to future consideration.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what power the President now has in this respect?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rather think that under the Army bill passed in 1916, and also under the food-control bill, the President could probably—I do not wish to express a final opinion on the subject—take over these utilities. He has not done that. There are complaints of a great many grievances resulting from the private ownership of refrigerator cars, from the private ownership of certain cattle cars, although, of course, a great many cattle cars are owned by the railroads now and are under governmental control, and from the private ownership and operation of stockyards. It is claimed that there is a grievance both on the part of the producer of live stock and on the part of the consumers of live-stock products. It was my impression that the limited power conferred by this amendment would enable the Director General to relieve the producers of a great many of these grievances and perhaps relieve the consumers of a great many of the grievances which they are alleged to have, and that that could be done without resorting to so radical a measure as will undoubtedly be forthcoming at an early date.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss the merits of this amendment at this time, but I understand that it has not been considered by the committee; that it is offered and is being read from the desk without any consideration at all upon the part of any committee and is based upon a report of the Federal Trade Commission that nearly every paper in the United States has condemned as unjust and a wrong against the five principal packers of this country.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the report of the Federal trade committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, submitted to the board of directors of the chamber, analyzing the report of the Federal Trade Commission; and if it be true—and I was going to say that I know in many respects it is—we ought to offer an amendment to this bill, if any amendment is offered, abolishing the commission.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire of the Senator who the directors making this report are.

Mr. SMOOT. The Federal trade committee of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. Who are they? Are the names there?

Mr. SMOOT. The chairman of the committee is Rush C. Butler.

Mr. KENYON. He is their counsel, is he not?

Mr. SMOOT. He is also the chairman of this particular subcommittee of the chamber, and I understand he is the attorney for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. I think it would be interesting to know just who the directors are, what their connections are, and whether they are connected with the packers in any way, in order to know what credence to give to their report.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator from Iowa will claim that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States is a corrupt body.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think it is, but I do not think the Federal Trade Commission is a corrupt body, either; and if the Senator condemns it, let us have the evidence as to the standing of the men who are condemning it. I am not in favor of this amendment. I do not think it is fair.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as far as the members or officers of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States are concerned, they are among the very best and most reputable business men in the United States; and as compared with Victor Murdock as a business man, or knowing what the business interests of this country require or are doing, there is as much difference as there is between the darkest night and the lightest day in favor of the former.

I ask, as a part of my remarks, permission to print this report in the RECORD, together with an editorial from the New York Times—no Senator can charge that with being a corporation or Republican paper—also an article from the Baltimore Sun.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah to publish certain articles in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States:

The Federal Trade Commission came into existence under excellent auspices. Taking office in the spring of 1915, the first commissioners had the benefit of much antecedent discussion. The purposes for which the commission was created were well stated by President Wilson when he addressed Congress on the proposal to create it. The keynote of his address was in the following words:

"The business men of the country desire something more than that the menace of legal process in these matters be made explicit and intelligible. They desire the advice, the definite guidance, and information which can be supplied by an administrative body, an interstate trade commission. The opinion of the country would instantly approve of such a commission."

In newspapers, magazines, and legal journals the purposes and functions of the commission were described until the commission, the objects of its creation, and its general place in the governmental organization were known and accepted in all parts of the country.

The commission early began a study of such subjects as unfair methods in competition, adverse conditions affecting our exporters in foreign markets, and the underlying causes of depression in the manufacture of lumber. It established a procedure which contemplated action on its part only after impartial hearings for all parties in interest. It received testimony upon questions of policy as well as regarding issues of fact. The manner of its independent inquiries through its own agents was indicative of a desire to develop the truth of situations. In other words, it gave promise of becoming a constructive body, expert in analysis and in information, able to suggest sound national policies for preventing abuses, and for encouraging proper development in the great field of American business enterprise outside the restricted jurisdictions which had been confided to such bodies as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board.

The expectations that were thus supported are now being disappointed. During the past year or 18 months the commission's attitude and procedure have changed, and its altered position has become well developed. The terms of office of the commissioners are fixed by the law creating the commission to continue for seven years and to expire in rotation, in order that there may be constantly in office a majority with experience and knowledge. In this manner continuity of purpose and method in the commission's work were sought. In the discussion of the bill it was stated in Congress that this continuity of experienced service was one of the essentials, and there can be no doubt that such was the desire of the administration and the public. Instead of being a body with permanency in its personnel the commission, in fact, has in its membership after but three years none of the first appointees. With every change in personnel there has been a substitution of the subjects which interest and occupy the commission. That various exigencies might arise which would justify resignation and retirement, of course, must be expected, but no less than two commissioners and a prominent member of its staff have been simultaneously candidates for political preferment. Conditions such as these inevitably lead to impressions that the commission is no longer a responsible body approaching its duties with a serious purpose to promote the public interest alone; that it seeks aggrandizement for itself and its members; and that it lacks the impartiality essential to any public agency which is to speak with authority and to promote the common cause of the Nation rather than to create discord, confusion, and disorganization.

It becomes our duty, therefore, to call your attention to some of the activities of the commission in which its present attitude is made manifest. If for no other reason, this committee would necessarily be impartial because in the membership of the chamber there are represented both producers and consumers, and most of the important industries. In direct interests many of these members are adverse, but they all join in subscribing to the purposes of the chamber, which include promotion of sound economic conditions in every branch of American industry and commerce and elimination of all business practices and situations that are incompatible with the public interest. For like reasons, the committee concerns itself with questions of the policy of the commission and its procedure, and not with the merits of particular cases. Finally, in its desire to avoid ex-parte statement, the committee has endeavored to refer only to matters which are of record, either in the commission's own publications or in the sworn testimony of its members and its staff before committees of Congress.

I. The commission has undertaken the exercise of functions beyond its own jurisdiction to the detriment of its proper usefulness.

The commission's interest in the situation regarding news-print paper was undoubtedly proper, but in seeking to have producers and consumers agree to establish it as an "arbiter" of their differences the commission went beyond the law of its creation, and possessing no power to enforce its findings, was placed in the awkward position of having its award ignored. It even went so far eventually as to propose that it undertake the distribution of all news-print paper. That Congress did not intend the commission to assume such duties was apparent from the action of the Senate on January 15, 1918, in voting down a bill containing this proposal. The commission has admitted some of its efforts were without express authority of law.

Before the Fuel Administration was established the commission undertook to influence distribution of anthracite coal, with the acquiescence of the operators. Even if the commission's belief that there were beneficial results is accepted, it remains true that this was not a proper function for the commission to exercise and that it did not have facilities essential for the task. It is common knowledge that distribution was so imperfect that proper supplies were not accumulated for the following winter, and that widespread hardship ensued.

The commission later perceived a similar function for itself in controlling the distribution of bituminous coal. It undertook to advise Congress that all bituminous coal should be sold through a common agency at one price for each quality and that the operators should receive individually their cost with an added profit. The commission itself was to be the agency. This recommendation it made in a report which showed scant data regarding bituminous coal. Legislation under which the Fuel Administration was created authorized the President to utilize the commission as a distribution agency, but this authority was not exercised, and by proclamation of July 3, 1918, most of the remaining activities of the commission with regard to coal were transferred from the commission to the Fuel Administration.

In August, 1917, the commission gave advice to the President which resulted in the prices fixed by him on August 21. The commission's prices were constructed upon a new computation of costs, which excluded, among other things, interest and depletion. The commission stigmatized reserves as coal held out of use and allowed no interest for investment in reserves. Part of the data before the commission was an anonymous estimate of costs in important fields. The correctness of the commission's method of computing costs is not here in question. The objections on the score of public interest are that the method was new, that it was applied at a critical moment when customary and honest bases of costs should not have been questioned; that it was arbitrary in that it had not been subjected to scrutiny at such hearings of the persons affected and the public as any responsible public body should accord, and that it placed below the cost of production the prices of at least 40,000,000 tons of bituminous coal in the annual supply. In other words, the commission was not prepared to undertake the highly important rôle it essayed and dealt recklessly alike with national interests and personal rights.

The commission's attitude toward trade associations furnishes another illustration of its desire to acquire new activities before adequately developing its statutory duties. There is a real and proper task for the commission in examining trade associations and pointing out ways in which they can be improved in the public interest as well as for the advantage of the industries. This constructive task the commission is apparently neglecting, and at the same time it seeks to usurp the functions of trade associations, in effect making itself a trade association for all industries. In support of this desire incorrect statements have been made. For example, on April 1, 1918, the House Committee on Appropriations was told that the fees for membership in the associations that collect statistics for production of newsprint and book paper were so high as to be prohibitive of membership for smaller manufacturers. The fact is that the fees for membership in the newsprint association are $25 a year and 4 cents a ton of paper produced (i. e., 4 cents on a value of $50 or more), and for the book-paper association, which is no longer in existence, they were 6 cents a ton.

II. The commission has begun the study of important situations, but because of vacillating interest or for other reasons, not apparent, has left its work incomplete.

The lumber industry has been studied for upward of 10 years by the commission and its predecessor, the Bureau of Corporations. No final conclusions and recommendations about fundamental economic conditions have been published, although repeatedly promised to congressional committees. Upward of $400,000 have been spent upon these studies and the printing of partial reports.

Since 1913 the commission and its predecessor have been engaged upon a "comprehensive inquiry" into the economic advantage and disadvantage of Federal legislation which might be enacted to permit maintenance of resale prices. This subject has been continuously before the public. Bills have been before committees of Congress. Nevertheless, the commission has failed to complete its study and present analyses of the fundamental economic questions that are involved in making any legislative decision. Last autumn the commission held hearings of a general nature and has instituted formal complaints against business houses which have endeavored to maintain resale prices. These complaints, however, can scarcely lead to more than an application of the law as it now stands in the light of decisions of the courts and can scarcely result in such conclusions of economic principle as obviously are needed.

Two years ago the House of Representatives directed a basic economic study into the bituminous-coal industry. In April, 1918, the chief economist of the commission testified that "the fundamental problem has never been touched yet."

These are a few of the important undertakings upon which the commission has entered but which it has not consistently pursued. The public interest suffers in consequence, not only because authoritative determinations are lacking regarding important matters but because there is a waste of public money, since material which is gathered, but laid aside, has to be reexamined when attention is again turned to the subject.

III. The commission's procedure, originally orderly and appropriate, has been changed without public notice or notice to Congress.

Unfair methods of competition afford a very important field for the commission's activity. The commission's province is to consider practices and when it decides they are unfair to order their termination. Most practices are brought into question before the commission by a business house which alleges unfairness on the part of a competitor. This circumstance indicates a need for perspicacity in the commission, that its action may not result in unfair advantage for the complainant and irreparable detriment to an innocent defendant. Apparently recognizing these possibilities the commission through its annual reports and testimony before congressional committees has given the public and Congress to understand that before it issues a formal complaint it notifies the party complained of regarding the nature of the charges and affords him an opportunity to state his side of the matter, or to desist, if he acknowledges impropriety. Members of the commission have testified to the benefits of this procedure, referring to instances in which unfair acts had been committed by subordinates without knowledge of their higher officials, who promptly made all reparation asked and took precautions for the future. The commission has also testified to its success in having a whole industry, such as the fertilizer industry, revise its methods.

The procedure has now been so changed that the commission itself has become an instrumentality for unfairness. There seem to be indisputable instances in which a defendant has had his first intimation through service of a formal complaint that any of his business methods were in question. The allegations of unfairness on his part, founded upon an ex parte presentation by a competitor or disgruntled customer whom he will not be able to face before the commission (since the commission becomes the formal complainant), supplemented by the commission's investigations to an extent that are unknown to him, are given to the newspapers by the commission with a release date placed as much as five days in advance, in order that widest possible publicity may be obtained for the allegations. In these statements to the newspapers the commission has disclosed concrete information as to the particulars of the alleged offense, whereas it has placed in the formal complaint served upon the defendant only general statements which did not advise the defendant of the charges he had to meet. As a consequence, defendants have had to consult the newspapers to identify the circumstances alleged to constitute the unfair method of competition in question. Accordingly, when the defendant comes before the commission for a hearing, he feels that his case has been prejudged. Such procedure is a form of harassment, is vexatious, and indicates a lack of the spirit of helpful cooperation which it was believed the commission would in abundant degree possess. Furthermore, it inevitably has its influence upon members of the commission's staff, leading them to consider persons against whom complaint is made as guilty until they are proved innocent. From the commission's present course there results an impression that the commission is proceeding in contradiction of the theory that ours is a government of laws and not of men.

IV. The commission has abused its powers of publicity.

The commission has power to make public from time to time such portions of the information it obtains in the exercise of its statutory functions as it deems expedient in the public interest. The value of the exercise of this power lies in the authoritativeness of the information which is placed before the public. The commission has exceeded its power in that it has sought publicity for matters which can not reasonably be designated as information. Its practices in obtaining publicity concerning its filing of formal complaints have already been described. The injustice of its course in this connection becomes apparent when it is observed that the commission has filed in all some 180 formal complaints, whereas it has disposed of only about 30. Some of these 30 complaints have been dismissed. Although the commission gives to the press a statement that a certain complaint has been dismissed, the commission must know that news regarding such action on its part never overtakes or corrects the publicity it causes to appear at the time the complaint is filed. Moreover, numerous complaints have been pending for many months without decision. Under such circumstances the commission's efforts for initial publicity clearly cause injustice.

At the same time there is carelessness, which causes unnecessary injury and confusion. When the commission gave to the press its statement about the first order it issued regarding resale prices, which was entered by "consent" on the part of the defendant, it said a manufacturer could not indicate prices to a retailer. This apparently prohibited the use of price lists and the printing of prices on packages. It was accordingly important. Nevertheless the commission, although letting it be informally understood in answer to individual inquiries that it did not prohibit price lists or prices on packages, gave no official explanation. It waited two months before presenting the true situation, through the medium of another decision. Another example of the carelessness of the commission may be cited. In the early part of this year it announced that for gasoline the margin between refiners' costs and wholesalers' prices had ranged from $5 to $15 a barrel. The commission subsequently issued a correction placing the margin at 50 cents to $1.50, but no correction could repair the damage that had been done through widespread publication of the first announcement.

The commission has used publicity to influence directly the course of legislation. For example, on August 1, 1917, when legislation was pending and a majority of the commission desired to have Congress give it power to fix prices on coal and act as pooling agent, it gave to the press a letter in which a coal operator strongly urged this course.

Although the question of Government operation of the meat-packing industry was in April committed to a special commission, on which the Federal Trade Commission had representation, and in May the special commission decided against Government operation unless it was subsequently found impossible to enforce the regulations of the Food Administration, the Federal Trade Commission on June 28 informed the Senate and the press that the meat packers "are soon to come under further Governmental regulation approved by Executive order."

V. Prominent features of the commission's recent food investigation where subversive of common justice.

On February 7, 1917, the President informed the commission it was "of the highest public concern to ascertain the truth or falsity" of allegations that "the course of trade in important food products is not free but is restricted and controlled by artificial means," and directed the commission to investigate. Hiring a special counsel at a rate of $30,000 a year and expenses, although it had stated to a committee of Congress the salary would be at the rate of $5,000, it proceeded, not in the spirit of the President's letter but with the apparent purpose of creating in advance a public impression that the allegations were true. It selected documents already in its possession and had them presented to it at public sessions by its special counsel, refusing to permit concerns that were mentioned in the documents to offer any testimony or produce other documents. It held public sessions at Boston, Philadelphia, St. Paul, and other cities, examined witnesses of its own choosing, and prevented cross-examination by the concerns at which it was made clear the proceedings were directed.

At each city the special counsel or other members of the staff let it be known that the Government contemplated taking over and operating the industry. The strange spectacle ended at Chicago in February, 1918, when application was made on behalf of the commission for a search warrant under a section of the espionage act and the circuit court of appeals quashed the warrant. The result of the commission's course was not to give information to the public but to place the commission in the position of seeking to create prejudice which would support an apparently preconceived purpose to inaugurate Government operation of the business. In other words, before completing the investigation which the President directed, the commission appeared in the guise of attempting to force adoption of a legislative policy in a matter as to which it had not reported the facts. Another result was to prevent such a determination as the President requested and which he declared was of the highest public concern.

The seriousness of the consequences of the commission's course is apparent from the circumstance that the commission's representative took oath that crimes had been committed. If there was crime on the part of any person the public welfare demands its immediate prosecution by the properly constituted authorities. It equally demands that the commission, which has no criminal jurisdiction, should sedulously refrain from alleging the perpetration of felonies which have not been proved in accordance with established legal procedure.

Although the commission stated in February, 1917, that its report of this investigation would be completed and published within eight months, and the services of its special counsel terminated on March 31, 1918, so much as a summary of a report regarding meat packing, which the commission said would be the first food industry it would investigate, was not published until August 8 of this year. This summary of 47 pages, the commission states, is to be followed by seven reports in support of its conclusions and recommendations. In other words, the commission follows a method of publicity which causes its allegations to obtain wide circulation without opportunity for the public to know the grounds on which these allegations are made. Regarding the facts of the industry in question, this committee, of course, is without information. It is in no sense in a position to express an opinion as to the merits of the commission's charges.

VI. In presenting information to Congress and the public the commission has been heedless of the accuracy and frankness which its position and the circumstances require.

Instances have already been cited. On June 28, 1918, however, the commission again showed its lack of responsibility by giving such form and content to a report made to the Senate regarding "profiteering" as to make general charges of a calumnious nature against business enterprise without supporting its charges with adequate facts. The commission couched its statements in sensational terms unwarranted by the facts set out. For example, it spoke of "bare-faced fraud." "monopolistsic control," "manipulation of the markets by illegal devices," and "preying with shameful avarice upon consumers." It quoted memoranda from one official of a leather company to another which show figures of considerable size but which indicate nothing as to the reasonableness of profits. Some of its statements defy interpretation, such as a declaration that flour mills in the year ended June 30, 1917, made an average of 52 cents on each barrel and nearly 36 per cent on their investment, "profits that are indefensible, considering that an average of the profit of one mill for six months of the year shows as high as $2 a barrel." It even resorts to hearsay in reciting it is understood that producers of aeroplane spruce in the Northwest have taken advantage of allied Governments.

Intrinsic faults in this report are even more serious. The commission criticized the principles of fixed prices which every other agency of the Government has approved as a means of at once regulating the market and obtaining the increased production the Nation requires. It stigmatized the efficiency of low-cost concerns. It palliated the earnings of one corporation because it "possesses a natural monopoly of a certain high-grade ore," thus necessarily implying that good fortune is ethical, whereas low costs attained through struggle for efficiency in operation are immoral. The commission, to an extent it did not disclose, made its computations upon new bases. According to its computation, which raises controverted questions such as the proper measure of value for stumpage and may even deny a distinction between capital and income recently made by the Supreme Court, it finds the profits of producers of southern pine "unusually and unnecessarily large." Yet the price-fixing committee of the Government, having before it the commission's own figures of costs, has recently increased the price for southern pine to the Government by approximately 15 per cent. As might be expected in view of these fundamental defects, the report contains no standards for an intelligent discrimination between the profits which are essential to the integrity of business enterprises and those which are extortionate.

Faults which go to the soundness of the profiteering report can be multiplied. Enough have been suggested to illustrate the lack of responsibility the commission felt in speaking about a subject which affects the morale of the Nation in time of war. That there are individuals in the community who for private gain will seek advantage from war conditions arises from the frailty of human nature. That these individuals should be found through an orderly procedure that accords with the spirit of our laws and institutions, and should be visited with condign penalties, is of the highest public importance; but the existance of individual error and crime is no reason for condemnation of the whole community, or any part of it, by broad accusation and innuendo.

VII. The commission has departed from the fundamental purpose for which it was established.

As the President said on January 20, 1914, provision for something more than the menace of legal process was desired in the bill for the creation of the commission. After the bill had become law the President, on September 6, 1916, reiterated this idea, declaring:

"A Federal Trade Commission has been created with powers of guidance and accommodation which have relieved business men of unfounded fears and set them upon the road of hopeful and confident enterprise."

The commission has in the last year or more apparently come to consider itself a governmental body for the gathering of evidence of the commission of crimes rather than an independent agency possessing powers of guidance and accommodation. This statement of your committee is not founded upon legal interpretation nor is it made with the idea of minimizing the necessity for criminal prosecution in merited cases. It finds its justification in numerous declarations of the commission itself. One example will suffice. When called upon by resolution of the Senate under date of April 24, 1916, to ascertain whether or not newspapers had been subjected to unfair practices in the sale of paper, the commission formally reported it had used its full powers to examine even private correspondence and it had transmitted the facts so gathered to the Department of Justice. In connection with the same investigation the commission had earlier assured the public that it was a body for scientific and economic adjustment rather than prosecution.

There is no inclination to minimize the tasks before the commission or its possibilities of usefulness. The energies and abilities of all the 700 persons it now has in its employ may well be engaged in proper activities. Recognition of the importance of the commission points the way to the action for which the situation calls. The committee recommends that the board of directors call the attention of the President to the outstanding defects of the commission's administration and of the interpretation it now gives to the law under which it acts, and at the same time urge that the President appoint to the commission, in whose membership two vacancies now exist, men whose training, temperament, experience, and reputation for sound judgment qualify them for the position, and whose interests will be single to the commission's work. In no other manner can confidence in the commission be restored.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMITTEE,
RUSH P. BUTLER, Chairman.

AUGUST 14, 1918.

[Editorial from the New York Times of Tuesday, Sept. 3, 1918.]

THE TRADE COMMISSION.

Either the Federal Trade Commission or the act creating it stands in need of amendment. That is made plain by the communication sent to President Wilson by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which arraigns the commission as unfair in its processes, inaccurate in its reports, abusive of its powers, hostile to the business of the country, and a fomenter of strife.

If the commission, with the approval of the Executive, is to continue its efforts to create prejudice against the great industries of the country, if it is to carry on the propaganda of a class struggle and engage in the agitation for Government ownership, then the act which established it should forthwith be amended to make its charter conform to its practices. It was believed when the commission was created that it was to inquire into practices alleged to be in restraint of trade, to give warning that unfair methods in competition must cease, and to use its influence to secure their abandonment. It was hoped that through voluntary compliance with its recommendations a great deal of costly litigation would be avoided and corporate good behavior generally established.

The commission's report on profiteering made it evident that the commissioners did not take that view of their duties. The communication to the President instances that report and other acts and utterances of the commission as evidence that it seeks to create prejudice "which would support an apparently preconceived purpose to inaugurate Government operation" of the packing business. Its methods of inquiry are declared to be "subversive of common justice," and in its report it employs "sensational terms unwarranted by the facts set out" and better suited to the compositions of an irresponsible muckraker than to the pages of an official document.

The observant public lost confidence in the commission when the profiteering report was published. If it is worth while to maintain the commission, if it is to serve any useful purpose, it should be cured of its present bolshevist and propagandist tendencies. The suggestion of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States that "men of a different type from those now in control be appointed to fill vacancies" is reasonable and sound.

TRADE COMMISSION BITTERLY SCORED—CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF UNITED STATES FILES GRAVE CHARGES WITH PRESIDENT—ABUSE OF BUSINESS ALLEGED—USURPATION OF POWER AND INEFFICIENCY ALSO MENTIONED—PETITION ASKS WILSON TO REMEDY CONDITION BY NAMING TWO ABLE MEN.

WASHINGTON, September 1.

Usurpation of power, inefficiency, and unjust abuse of business interests are among grave charges against the Federal Trade Commission which have been laid before President Wilson by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

In a letter sent to the President several days ago and made public to-night by the chamber, the directors of the organization approve and submit a report denouncing the Trade Commission as an irresponsible body that has lost the confidence of the public and asking the President to remedy this condition by filling two existing vacancies in the membership with able men "whose interests will be single to the commission's."

This report was prepared by the chamber's Federal trade commission, of which Rush C. Butler, a Chicago lawyer, is chairman. It presents the following seven specific charges, with detailed criticism in support:

SEVEN SPECIFIC CHARGES.

"The commission has undertaken the exercise of functions beyond its own jurisdiction, to the detriment of its proper usefulness.

"The commission has begun the study of important situations, but because of vacillating interest or for other reasons not apparent has left its work incomplete.

"The commission's procedure, originally orderly and appropriate, has been changed without public notice or notice to Congress.

"The commission has abused its powers of publicity.

"Prominent features of the commission's recent food investigation were subversive of common justice.

"In presenting information to Congress and the public the commission has been heedless of the accuracy and frankness which its position and the circumstances require.

"The commission has departed from the fundamental purposes for which it was established."

PRINCIPLES OF CONDUCT WRONG.

The report sets forth that it does not undertake to criticize in detail specific acts of the commission, but rather to point out mistakes in principles of conduct. The President is assured that the chamber and its committee, which has followed the work of the commission since its organization three years ago, does not represent special business interests.

After quoting from the President's address to Congress in 1915 on the proposal to create the Federal Trade Commission and the general sentiment of approval created by the commission's establishment, the report says:

"It gave promise of becoming a constructive body, expert in analysis and in information, able to suggest sound national policies for preventing abuses and for encouraging proper development in the great field of American business enterprises.

EXPECTATIONS DISAPPOINTED.

"The expectations are now being disappointed. * * * Instead of being a body with permanency in its personnel the commission, in fact, has in its membership, after but three years, none of the first appointees."

Referring to the fact that "two commissioners and a prominent member of its staff have been simultaneously candidates for political preferment," the report continues:

"Conditions such as these inevitably lead to impressions that the commission is no longer a responsible body approaching its duties with serious purpose to promote the public interests alone; that it seeks aggrandizement for itself and its members; and that it lacks the impartiality essential to any public agency which is to speak with authority and to promote the common cause of the Nation rather than to create discord, confusion, and disorganization."

In support of the charge that the commission has taken on improper functions to the detriment of its intended duties the report cites the commission's news-print report and its efforts to supervise distribution of coal before the creation of the Fuel Administration.

INQUIRIES NEVER FINISHED.

Investigations of the lumber inquiry, of the resale-price practices, and of bituminous-coal production were started but never completed, the report says, and these are cited as outstanding examples of permitting public interest to suffer and at the same time wasting public money.

Charges of unfairness, often initiated by a jealous competitor, the report declares, are preferred by the commission and made public without giving the accused firm advance notice of the charges or sufficiently definite information on the charges to enable it to make proper answer, while by filing about 180 normal complaints and disposing of only about 30, giving full publicity to the original complaints with meager announcement of dismissal, the commission has caused great injustice, injury, and confusion.

In criticism of methods adopted during the recent investigation of the packing industry the report says a special counsel (Francis J. Heney) was employed at $30,000 a year and expenses, "although it had been stated to a committee of Congress that the salary would be at the rate of $5,000."

"The result of the commission's course was not to give information to the public, but to place the commission in the position of seeking to create prejustice, which would support an apparently preconceived purpose to inaugurate Government operation of the business," the report says.

PROFITEERING REPORT DENOUNCED.

Referring to the commission's recent report to Congress on profiteering, the report says:

"The commission again showed its lack of responsibility by giving such form and content to a report as to make general charges of a calumnious nature against business enterprises without supporting its charges with adequate facts. The commission couched its statements in sensational terms unwarranted by the facts set out. For example, it spoke of 'barefaced fraud,' 'monopolistic control,' 'manipulation of the markets by illegal devices,' and 'preying with shameful avarice upon consumers.'"

Members of the Federal Trade Commission are William B. Colver (chairman), John F. Fort, and Victor Murdock. Joseph E. Davies and William J. Harris recently resigned membership to seek senatorial nominations in Wisconsin and Georgia, respectively.

Besides Mr. Butler, the chairman, members of the Federal Trade Commission of the chamber of commerce are: William K. Dean, St. Paul, member of a hardware firm; Alfred B. Koch, Toledo, department-store proprietor; W. L. Saunders, New York, president of a machinery manufacturing company; Henry R. Seager, professor of economics at Columbia University; Alexander W. Smith, Atlanta, lawyer; Dr. I. C. White, West Virginia State geologist; Silas P. Adams, Portland, Me.; and William C. Coffin, Pittsburgh, consulting engineer.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to accompany that request with the request that a portion of the report of the Federal Trade Commission be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the whole report has been printed in full in the RECORD, and there is no earthly need of spending any more money in that way.

Mr. GORE. I was not aware that it had been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it has been printed in the RECORD in full.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say that I have no disposition to precipitate the consideration of this amendment without giving Senators an opportunity to investigate it. I will say, also, that Senators have spoken to me who are very much concerned in the early passage of this bill, and who do not wish to see the prohibition amendment, I may say, encumbered with other amendments that might jeopardize the measure. Out of deference to their requests, I will ask permission to withdraw this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senators that they probably have gotten out of the frying pan, but I do not know just where they have landed.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care where we land when the Senate has time to consider a matter of this importance. We can consider it later; but I want to say to the Senator now that if I wanted to defeat such a proposition as this, I would want every man in the United States to read the report of the Federal Trade Commission; and no one can read the report without knowing that it is conceived in hatred and sensational, unjust, and untrue in character.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say in that connection that I have heard a good deal of criticism of this report, and it rather strikes me that there is a good deal of it that is ad captandum criticism. I have not heard an analysis of the facts presented by the commission and I have not heard any refutation of those facts.

For my own part I believe, so far as I have been able to investigate it, that the report is largely justified. I think that the ramifications of the packing houses of this country pass even the imagination of those who have not investigated the matter. I may say that on yesterday I had an informal hearing with respect to this subject, and the revelations to me were amazing as to where they have extended their tentacles and the various kinds of business that they are drawing unto themselves. The domination that they are establishing over various lines of endeavor, I think, is a public menace, not to use a much stronger term.

Of course, I am perfectly willing to hear the facts and the evidence presented by this commission refuted. So far the criticism has been rather ill-tempered and not based upon very substantial evidence.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has inserted at length in his remarks the report of the Federal Trade Committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce to its board of directors. I want to state, in addition, that while this is a report of the Federal Trade Committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce to the board of directors of the chamber, it will have practically the unanimous approval of every member of the United States Chamber of Commerce, which is made up of the different chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and business associations of the various States of the Union. It will be practically unanimous.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to make the same inquiry of the Senator from Illinois that I addressed to the Senator from Utah. Who are the directors of the chamber of commerce to whom this report was made?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not give their names—Mr. Peak, of Moline, Waddell Catchings, of New York, and I do not know who else. Let me state, however, that all of them are men of standing in their different occupations. All of them are actually engaged in business. It is not an ornamental board of directors.

Mr. KENYON. I do not doubt that; but what I am anxious to know is, what connection they have, if any, with the packers, or with the various institutions in the country which the packers control.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have none that I know of.

Mr. KENYON. Is the Senator sure about that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am as sure as I am of any business men, some of whom I have known for 30 years.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know that they do have, but I do know that the packers have such connections all over the country that gentlemen are very apt to have some connection with them.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no stock owned, so far as I know, by any of the directors in any of the packing companies or any of the affiliated companies—the leather or fertilizer or stock-food companies, or anything of that sort.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, do they refute in any way the findings of the Federal Trade Commission as to the operations and the profits of these packing companies?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. That is not the purpose of their report. I can go into that, if necessary.

Mr. McCUMBER. They might explain them and justify them; but what I wanted to know was whether they denied the truth of the statements made by the Trade Commission as to the profits of the packers.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The report criticizes the acts and methods of the commission; and upon the figures of the packers' business it does not require an expert accountant. In the report of the Federal Trade Commission, widely heralded to the public and given out, there are at least two material statements that are not based upon facts. This, however, is a matter that is not connected with the packing plants, except indirectly, or with the agencies which they employ for the distribution of their products. This is merely a general criticism by the Federal trade committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce of the methods employed by the Federal Trade Commission, not merely in the packers' case but the methods they have employed generally. Instead of being a help to the business men, as originally was supposed to be the purpose of the Trade Commission, it has turned out to be quite the contrary.

The President said:

> The business men of the country desire * * * the advice, the definite guidance and information which can be supplied by an administrative body, an interstate trade commission. The opinion of the country would instantly approve of such a commission.

That means an investigating committee which would discharge functions similar to those of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is semijudicial, so that all persons are given a hearing. Both sides of a controverted question of fact are permitted to be heard. The Federal Trade Commission have converted themselves into a prosecuting agency and sit in various parts of the country as a grand jury, indicting upon ex parte hearings; such is the nature of their investigation made in the case of the packing plants. There are material parts of the packing-plant report that are absolutely without foundation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's last statement surprises me somewhat. I had supposed that the Trade Commission had heard from both sides before making their report. Am I mistaken in that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator is. I think it was an ex parte hearing.

Mr. THOMAS. I had supposed that it was a full hearing, in which both sides appeared.

Mr. SHERMAN. The packers, as a matter of fact, were denied an opportunity to place in the record of such hearings as were had testimony which would give the whole of the conditions on which the commission ought to base a report. There was no investigation of the comparative profits. There is no more reason for stating that in the prewar period $140,000,000 was an excessive profit than there would be for taking the prewar profits of at least 100 other corporations whose business conditions have been tabulated and are accessible. As a matter of fact, there are any number of industrial plants whose profits have exceeded three to five times the dividends paid by the packing plants, not only on their capital stock but upon the actual money invested.

It is not merely the capital stock, because the packers have not watered their stock. They have merely put in dollar for dollar for all of the money they are using in their business. Their inventory values have increased. Their borrowings at the banks have increased. A single packing plant, that of Swift & Co., for instance, that used to have $75,000,000 of borrowed money, sometimes running as low as $50,000,000, have now a borrowed capital of $150,000,000. Their inventory values have increased correspondingly. They have gone up as fast as the price of live stock. The report that was made on the different items by the Federal Trade Commission was not based upon an investigation of the actual amount of capital involved in the transaction. The report was based upon the profits for three years, the $140,000,000 profit for 1915, 1916, and 1917. That would be an average, say, of $46,000,000 per year for the five packers. It was not based upon the actual investment. It was put out in a way that would create the impression that they were making abnormal profits. As a matter of fact, during the three-year period of 1915, 1916, and 1917, in which the $140,000,000 were earned, it was earned on an actual volume of business of more than four and a half billions of dollars, involving a profit of only 3.11 cents on every dollar's worth of business.

I called attention the other day, Mr. President, to the fact that the Ford Motor Co. is making 30 per cent, or was in 1916, the last year of the litigation. I have had no opportunity of collecting information on its dividends since that time, but they have not decreased any, to say the least of it. Then, there are industrial plants of various kinds, and especially a series of them that were tabulated by Mr. Pinchot in a printed table here showing large profits. The profits of others ran all the way from 25 to 500 per cent on the investment.

Nothing is said about those. No attempt is made to pillory them before the public as taking unjust gains or as profiteering upon the private consumer. None of those things are given to the public in this report, and no opportunity was given to the men who are in charge of these large enterprises to present the evidence of the entire transactions.

I understand that the amendment has been withdrawn, anyhow; but as a matter of justice, and especially in view of this report of the Federal trade committee of the Chamber of Commerce, learning that the Senator from Utah has embodied that in his remarks, I wanted to add what I did originally—that the report will receive the practically unanimous approval of the United States Chamber of Commerce, which represents every State in the Union.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I only want to add that I believe the report of the commission will receive practically the unanimous indorsement of the people of the United States, who have been robbed on meats by the packers all of these years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish the members of the commission would run for office, every one of them. I will undertake to say that if they ran for office in my own State every member of the commission would be beaten by a quarter of a million. Besides being arrant demagogues, they never were elected to any office in their lives since this question has come up. The Senator is in error on the robbery. The packers make 3 cents on each dollar of meat handled. It is the lowest margin or among the lowest of profits found in any line of business in the country. Every retail dealer exceeds it many times. If 3 cents profit on a dollar is robbery, then other lines of business ought to be exterminated. There is not a retail meat dealer in the country who does not make from ten to fifteen times as much.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I concede that the packers might have the power in Illinois to defeat them. The people of the country would not defeat them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I undertake to say that if any of them want to run for office anywhere in the United States they will have a good opportunity if they will ever go into a primary. We have universal direct primaries in most of the States now, where the people have a chance to rule; and I should like to see some of these self-appointed business men, who have done nothing in their lifetimes except to destroy and criticize others who are doing things, submit their claims to the people.

One has been a newspaper man in Minnesota—the most vociferous and blatant one of the lot—who never did a large business of any kind in his life. Another is a gentleman who was once in the House of Representatives, and who a long time ago was beaten, since the State of Kansas learned what he is and what he represents. Possibly it might have a radical spell. It gets them about once every 20 years, I understand, like my own State does, when everybody else goes about his own business. It always comes in peace times, after a long and prosperous period, when people forget about the affairs that they stir up. Outside of those conditions, when those revulsions come, about once in every 20 years, when nobody but the vociferous portion of the community can be heard, when the destroyers are much in evidence, these men never can be elected, and universally when they have been elected they have been accidents, and have been repudiated the next time they ran for office, when their record was known.

If there is any popularity about the members of the Federal Trade Commission I wish them to go back to their States and submit their claims and be nominated and run and see what the dear people think of them. I am weary of hearing criticisms of business men and of the Senate and of the House by men who could not be elected town clerk in a brush township anywhere in the United States. They are the type of people that are running about over the country condemning every business concern that has made a success of its affairs. The domestic civilian affairs of the Government are largely run by life's distinguished failures. This is one reason it is costing so much. There is not a solitary one of these gentlemen who has had the hardihood or the constitutional nerve to submit himself on the ticket of either party or any party anywhere in any State.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I invite them to a test of their popularity in any State where they live, including my own.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON. Did not one of them run for Senator up in Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. And is not one of them running for Senator down in Georgia now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. Their efforts are confined to running.

Mr. KENYON. That is what I wanted to suggest—that there was one now running. I merely wanted to suggest, in the interest of accuracy, that one of them is running for the Senate in Georgia.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true. There was one running in Wisconsin with presidential indorsement who was defeated, as he ought to have been.

Mr. SMOOT. There was one running for Senator in Kansas. There was one running for Senator up in Wisconsin.

In fact, the whole Federal Trade Commission, since it was first organized, has been a political organization, a stepping-stone to run for some office in the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true. And, Mr. President, instead of being a fair-minded instrumentality of Government, as the Interstate Commerce Commission has been, to settle questions between shippers and carriers, the Federal Trade Commission has been just the reverse of it. I will take it two years back, at least. This commission has been merely an addled egg, perfectly rotten, in the nest for the incubation of still more addled candidates. That is its history. There is not one of its members that is not a radical, a bolshevist in this country, a firebrand, an economic incendiary; and all or the most of them were in private life business failures of the most pronounced type. They have succeeded in no profession. They have built up no business. They have accomplished nothing but ceaseless agitation.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly give us the names of these gentlemen to whom he pays such high compliments?

Mr. SHERMAN. One of them is Victor Murdock.

Mr. ASHURST. Who are the others?

Mr. SHERMAN. Another is Mr. Colver. Those two are the types.

Mr. ASHURST. Who are the others?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Davies was another one. They have accomplished nothing. Go to their own States and find out what they have been doing. None of them have become distinguished in their professions or in any industrial line. I would be glad if one of them would settle in some State and stay there long enough to acquire a fixed residence, some kind of a permanent abode that would qualify him sufficiently to run for office, and then let him run, and see how rapidly he would arrive anywhere. I know that type. I see them on the curbstone out on Jackson Boulevard in Chicago every night I am there. They are valorous gentlemen on a platform or treading a soap box. They are the younger brothers of the I. W. W.'s, all of them. They all bear a strong family resemblance to Haywood. They are poor excuses for public officers. They are a disgrace to this administration; they are a menace to business; they are a discredit to the country; and I only yearn for the day when some of this ill-flavored gentry will get on the ticket and submit their claims to the people. I know how to meet them. If you will tell the truth about them and nail them down to Mother Earth, they will melt away like snow in a summer sun. There is no substance to them.

If I wanted to criticize this administration—and I do not, save on its domestic affairs, when it is necessary—I could offer no more potent criticism than the fact that it collects about it such instrumentalities to administer government among a free people, to destroy, to break down, and weaken every line of business. Anything that is successful is necessarily the object of their attacks. The only successful concerns, according to their definition, are the ones that have landed in a bankruptcy court. If a concern accomplishes the purposes of its organization or is industrially strong on its ability or its merits, then it becomes the target for their attacks, an object for the perversion and the abuse of the powers of government wielded in their hands.

I want at some time to take up this matter and discuss it at length when I expect to be somewhat unhampered and without restraints or limits upon my comments upon these gentlemen.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? I just want a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it would be offensively presumptuous in me to rise here in the guise of attempting to read a lecture to my esteemed friend the Senator from Illinois. I think we all more or less grow into the habit in the Senate here—I know I am guilty of that—of allowing our feelings to come to the surface in a very vehement manner. Now, we ought not to forget that the men whom we assail so vehemently are taken at a disadvantage. We take advantage of them. They can not reply here. What we say here we can not be sued for or arrested for libel. The Constitution gives us—and it should—the right to say whatever we please, to make any argument we see fit. I submit to my learned friend, for whom I have an affection, that when he reflects on it he will see that it is rather unfair to characterize men as he has.

The Federal Trade Commission is composed of the following men:

William J. Harris, chairman. I am told, sotto voce, that he is off the commission now.

Joseph E. Davies. I am told that he is off. Very well. I am glad that it is disclosed here that I do not even know who they are. I am very glad to know that.

The other members, reading from the Congressional Directory, are William B. Colver, John F. Fort, and Victor Murdock.

I would know Victor Murdock when I saw him if I should meet him on the street. I saw Mr. Fort last night and happened to know him. I am not a friend of these men; but I do say that there is nothing in their records in a public way, and nothing in a private way, that in good conscience and in good faith ought to require a Senator to get up here and traduce them in such a violent way. They can make no reply. It is unfair to make an assault on them in this fashion.

These men may be pilloried here in the Senate, but when the thoughtful people of the country make up their judgment as to what these men have done or failed to do, I do not believe they need fear the judgment of the American people; and I do not know anything about them, either.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have been sued five times individually in the last 20 years. I regret that I am restrained by parliamentary limitations here. I can not say what I should like to say, but I can say it out on the platform when I am outside of the Senate Chamber in a campaign or at the rare intervals when I get inside the Chautauqua grounds, where I meet these gentlemen in their native lair. I can say what I please there, and I have said it. I hold myself responsible for what I say. If I say anything that I can not prove, the courts are open. I will not ask for any slackers' round-up. There will be no 65,000 or 70,000 people taken into custody when they go after me. There will be just one. It will be the defendant in the case. I can employ lawyers and fight my cases just as well as they can, unless they do it in the name of the Government. If you employ the whole power of the Republic against a single defendant, as you do in a criminal case, I understand that that puts the defendant at some disadvantage; but when it is said that these gentlemen are taken unawares, that they are working under great handicaps and at a disadvantage, and can not reply or defend themselves, in fact, because we can say what we please here in the Senate, and that these gentlemen have no redress, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. SHERMAN. In just a moment. First of all, two of them are newspaper men. They have access to the columns of certain newspapers. Both of them are trained newspaper men of many years' standing, somewhat given to sensationalism in their columns. Would it be said that these harmless, inoffensive innocents that come in can not take care of themselves? Why, they wield a pen of their own. They can always take care of themselves. For 20 years their forte has been attacking other people.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. In a minute. They have spent their time all these years in assaulting other people, and nine times out of ten the ones they criticized were without blame. I attack them without scruple, and I will keep it up with pleasure until such time as I see fit to desist.

Nobody can invoke for them the shield of injured innocence. We have known them in the West and Northwest for a long time, and if any forbearance is to be shown let it be shown to somebody else.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I should not have risen a moment ago, because these men have committed the greatest offense we know in politics. They were orthodox, and they have committed a heresy. They need no defense. There is no defense for them. They belonged to the Senator's party, and committed the great crime of heresy by going to another party. To him murder and all other things of that sort are as nothing compared to political heresy. I should not have attempted it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The idea that those lambs will be brought to sacrifice on the altar equally with the victims of plutocracy is a statement which carries its own refutation with it. In the days past, and I will say not very long past, they went forth to battle fearlessly, and would fight anybody who attacked them or said a word about them, or gave them excuses to do so. There never was a time since I have known them that they have been meek virtue on a pedestal. I care nothing for the political heresy to which the Senator alludes. That difference has long ago been composed between those responsible for the division. The type to which allusion is made is a remnant rescued from the political junk yard to fill Democratic offices. They must adorn and gratify the appointing power. It is high time for plain speaking here and in the country. Silence longer is becoming a crime.

If any defense were necessary, they would have made it themselves. What I am complaining about is that such persons are put upon a highly responsible commission with such duties as are mentioned in the President's message at the time these men were appointed and confirmed or the agency itself created.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will allow me, of course, as he has told us two or three times, he has known of these men for many years. They were appointed and required to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States. The Senator was singularly silent when these appointments came in. I wonder he did not, in his ringing and vociferous way, tell us something about these men, so that we would not have confirmed such characters. Why did he not give this information when their names were sent in? The Senator voted to confirm some of them?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. If the Senator is yearning for that information, I will so state it to him. Does he know of any attempt to prevent a confirmation here that has been successful when it was conducted by a minority man?

Mr. ASHURST. I have seen confirmations rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. What one?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know that I am at liberty to speak of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. None from my State, unless asked by my colleague and he wanted it done.

Mr. ASHURST. But I do know that a Republican Senator—God bless his memory; may the sod rest lightly on his bosom—objected to a nomination and asserted that the nomination was objectionable to him, and that nominee was not confirmed. I do not want to mention the name, but it was an appointment to the Trade Commission. Now, if this majority would extend such a courtesy to one Senator, it would surely act that way toward the Senator from Illinois. If the Senator from Illinois, when the confirmations came in, had risen and declared himself in the language which he has used to-day, I doubt very much if these men would have been confirmed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I might have convinced the Senator from Arizona, as impossible as it seems now at this late day.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Illinois evidently did not convince me.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only one I remember who has been successfully attacked was in the case of the late Senator Gallinger, the lamented predecessor of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], now the minority leader. He objected to the confirmation of Raymond Stevens on this board. There was a somewhat long-drawn-out contest. That is the only one that I know of, and that was very largely, if not entirely, on the ground that he was personally objectionable to the Senator.

I could not say that these men are personally objectionable to me. Unless that board can be framed up in a way that it will comply with the spirit of Congress when the act was passed as a quasi judicial body, I would just as lief have this horrible example go on as representative of this administration as not, unless more sound business sense can be shown in appointments than has been done heretofore. It has been used for political purposes, not only just what these men want to give them prominence, but it has been used after they were put there by these men for the purpose of attacking large concerns with a view of winning popularity for the assailants. What avail for me to say anything? I can not even beat the confirmation of a postmaster that requires the action of the Senate in my own State. How could I attack a member of this commission? How can I do anything? When they are unsatisfactory to my colleague and both of us join, then ordinarily it is a fixed rule of the Senate that the rejection shall be made, and that is put upon the ground that they are personally objectionable. There are not many Democrats who are objectionable to me personally. It very seldom happens. They have always waged honorable warfare on me. They never put it in a form that I would make objection to on personal grounds.

I remember in the case of Senator Gallinger the nomination was objectionable personally because of a variety of attacks made upon him when he was a candidate in 1914.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. There was a nomination of a gentleman by the name of Thomas E. Jones. I do not know whether the Senator remembers that or not or opposed him or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I did not. I was for him, and I wired the President that Thomas E. Jones was, in my judgment, a competent and fit man.

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad that is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I simply say right here and now the Senator was right for once in his life. I did not know he was for Mr. Jones. I thought he might have been opposed to him.

I will also say, if the Senator would rise in his place when a nomination is sent in here—I am not going to tell anything about the record, but I have seen it happen half a dozen times when a Senator on either side would rise in his place—and simply say that a certain nominee was objectionable to him and he was opposed to his confirmation, the nominee would not be confirmed. I like that rule. I think it is a good rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is because the nominee is personally obnoxious. I never have beaten a confirmation since I have been here. I only had one objection, and I finally yielded that. But it is useless to talk about the rights of the minority in this administration. It is love's labor lost. What rights do we have? Simply a right to our seats. What right does Congress have itself? Take both sides. It is extremely limited. It is largely a Congress that is instructed what to do. It has become a superfluous branch of the Government. It has delegated the major part of its powers to the Executive. I have a volume here at my desk, which I will forbear to read, entitled "The State." Its author is the present President, and in it he declares that the interference by the Executive in legislative affairs is an abuse of his prerogative and power. Even the majority Senators are compelled to change front sometimes on questions, sometimes so rapidly that they are dizzy before they are able to get to their seats and explain their change in affairs. "Stand by the President." How can you stand by him when he will not stand still on any question long enough for anybody to find out what it is? What are the rights of the minority? I will have occasion on some other question to take up that subject when I can give it sufficient time.

I go back to the members of this commission. They ought to resign. Let them resign and run for an elective office. There is scarcely an appointee in this entire list of responsible agencies conducting these examinations of the industrial concerns of the country who could be elected in any State of the Union on either ticket if he were nominated. I have seen that tried, and I want it to be tried again. That is the reason why I am opening the door for them to do as they like about it.

There are some limitations here. I realize that it would be improper at this late hour, after 5 o'clock, to pursue the subject further, but I have a good deal that I want to say. This is all of an extemporaneous character, and I wish to take time to condense it and put it within proper compass in future discussions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not wish to break into the Senator's discussion or to criticize the Senator for personal reflections upon gentlemen. Of his actions he must be the judge himself. I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of the report the Senator refers to, because I have not read it. I know Mr. Colver. He was not appointed at my suggestion. I did not know of his appointment until after it was made. He was the business manager of a St. Paul paper, a good business man, and I believe an honest man and an honorable gentleman. I do not say that I agree with Mr. Colver in all his ideas. That I will not stop to discuss; but he is not a dishonest man.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, within the limitations of the rules of this body, and they are very liberal, every Senator has the right to determine his own line of conduct, and of that I have no criticism. I sympathize, however, very deeply with the suggestions made by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] when he called attention to the fact that we are here a privileged body. For what we say we can not be held accountable either civilly or criminally. Hence those whom we attack can only reply upon the outside.

I am aware, Mr. President, that the Senator from Illinois is a man of great personal and moral courage. Both have been tested, and we must here pay tribute to his possession of those two genuine and rare virtues. There is no question but that he will say outside of this Chamber and perhaps emphasize anything that he may say within the Chamber. I hope that is true of all of us.

In what I shall say, and I shall be very brief, I shall not reflect upon the judgment or the sentiments of any Member of this body. We may pursue such a course here within the rules as I have said as addresses itself to our better judgment.

During my somewhat brief occupancy of a seat in this body I have had occasion to criticize a great many men and a great many measures. I have, however, abstained, because I think I ought to do it, except where absolutely necessary, from reflections which might be construed as affecting the character or the integrity of the individuals.

Mr. President, I am slightly acquainted with one of the members of the Trade Commission. I know them all by reputation.

Whatever may be said of their business capacity, upon which I do not pass judgment, I want before this body adjourns to offer my testimony to their integrity, their uprightness, and their morality.

I have known Mr. Victor Murdock for a number of years, not intimately. I have known of him for a very considerable number of years. He has been a strong, forceful, useful, and purifying element in the political life of this Nation. He is a man of strong convictions, fearless in their expression, and courageous in their defense. I consider him one of the best characters in public life, and personally I will say nothing more of him.

I know Gov. Fort, former chief executive of the great State of New Jersey, whose record there is a splendid one, who carried out the pledges of his party as far as it was possible and wrote a creditable chapter not only in the history of his State but in the record of the party which elected him.

I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with Mr. Colver. All I know of him is to his credit.

Mr. President, these men may have made mistakes in the execution of their duties. I believe they have attempted faithfully, earnestly, and conscientiously to discharge them.

The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] informs me that the finding and report of this commission was made after a full hearing, and the witnesses and parties representing both sides of the controversy were given ample opportunity to present their cases and their facts to the consideration of the commission. I recall distinctly that an attempt was made to secure some documentary testimony in the possession of the packers. They appealed to the courts for protection and received it. That indicates, Mr. President, that this was not only not an ex-parte proceeding but one in which the facts were sought to be elicited and in which both sides were given a hearing.

I do not criticize the packers for appealing to the courts if they thought that by so appealing they were exercising a right given them by the Constitution, nor the courts themselves for granting the relief which was asked for and excluding these documents from the scrutiny and the possession of the commission.

I think, Mr. President, in its last analysis the offense which these men have committed has been their audacity in attacking the most exclusive, the most merciless, and the most unscrupulous monopoly of all the monopolies that have overshadowed the prosperity of the people of the United States.

I have read the report of the committee of the chamber of commerce. It is a very intelligent and intelligible report. I shall cast no reflections upon it. The other report may be entirely wrong; I do not know; but I am inclined to think that when we stop to consider that the shareholders and directors of these great packing concerns are unquestionably members of the boards of trade and chambers of commerce—among the members, at least—which make up the constituents of the National Chamber of Commerce, I would be as fully justified in attacking that report as emanating from interested sources as to violently attack, not the report, but the personal character and position of the men who had the temerity to make it and submit it to the American people.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that this Government will, in time of war, take over any industry not absolutely essential to the prosecution and the successful termination of this great conflict. I have been in favor of the municipal ownership of many utilities, but to change the policy of a people in time of war, if the change is to be permanent, is always fraught with difficulty if not with danger.

Hence, in saying what I have I must not be taken as in any manner approving the recommendation of this commission that the business of the packers be taken over by the Government. I do not want to see it done in time of war unless it becomes absolutely indispensable to our success. If that is the case, then, report or no report, the President and ourselves have but one duty to perform, and that is to act accordingly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator yield to me for just one second in this regard?

Mr. MARTIN. I will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I shall take but a moment.

Mr. President, as a Member of this body on this side of the Chamber, I desire to indorse what has been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I simply wish to add my testimony—of little value, doubtless—to the character, the integrity, the honesty, and the indefatigable industry of the members of the Federal Trade Commission. At some time in the future, with the permission of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], I trust to accept his challenge and to discuss with him the report of that commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to direct myself especially to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If these distinguished gentlemen, these highly capable men, possess such resourceful ability and capacity of the kind that would be in keeping with the glowing recommendations offered in their behalf, Mr. President, I am unable to understand the reprehensible character of their work. I judge men by what they do, by the effects, and not by the men themselves. If I judge them harshly, it is because their work calls for that harsh judgment. I hope I shall be present when the matter is gone into at length.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 6, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate September 5 (legislative day, September 4), 1918.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 5, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, give us this day our daily bread, a healthy body, a clear mind, a pure heart, an earnest desire to leave in its wake a worthy record and thus be the possessors of a clear conscience. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RUBEY, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. DICKINSON, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

WATER-POWER BILL.

Mr. SIMS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. SIMS. To move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the gentleman from Tennessee would not permit me to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which is at the Speaker's desk, the regular Agricultural appropriation bill, which was vetoed by the President. But all the items in this bill have been agreed to in conference, and the conference report has been agreed to by both Houses, and if I can have unanimous consent to take it up now I do not think it ought to take over 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that I think we will get through with the water-power bill early enough to enable the gentleman to take that up before the end of the day; and if not, then before we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the revenue bill he will have time.

Mr. LEVER. I would rather the gentleman would not object. I will withdraw the request, because the objection automatically would send this bill to committee. I withdraw the request, Mr. Speaker, temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his request.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, known as the water-power bill, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I find on reading the RECORD that section 15 has never been read. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] suggested that the section be read, but the RECORD shows that, instead, section 16 was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that both sections were read.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read, beginning with section 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the charges arising from licenses hereunder shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. Fifty per cent of the charges arising from licenses hereunder for the occupancy and use of national forests is hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture in the survey, construction, and maintenance of roads and trails within such national forests. Fifty per cent of the charges arising from licenses hereunder for the occupancy and use of national parks is hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the improvement and development of such parks. Fifty per cent of the charges arising from licenses hereunder for the occupancy and use of public lands, and of national monuments, and power site or other reserves outside of national forest, shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act. All proceeds from any Indian reservation shall be placed to the credit of the Indians on such reservation. Fifty per cent of the charges arising from all other licenses hereunder is hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in the maintenance and operation of dams and other navigation structures owned by the United States or in the construction, maintenance, or operation of headwater improvements of navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. SIMS and Mr. ESCH rose.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of this section except the last four words of line 25, page 44, and all of line 1, on page 45, and the first three words of line 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMS: Pages 44 and 45, strike out, in section 17, the last four words on line 25, page 44, and line 1 and the first three words on line 2, page 45, as follows: "All proceeds from any Indian reservation shall be placed to the credit of the Indians on such reservation."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know just how much thought the Members of the House in Committee of the Whole have given to this section, but this provides for the appropriation of all funds arising from charges made under this bill to specific purposes; all revenues arising from projects constructed on the public lands in forest reserves go to the improvement of public roads and trails on forest reserves, and as to all those on public lands not in forest reserves are to be localized and spent upon the public lands and all charges collected from navigable rivers in the States are to be used for certain improvements upon the particular rivers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this clearly would prevent any recapture of the property out of any amortization fund under the provisions of this bill, because it specifically appropriates everything that arises under the bill as it now stands, under the theory, I suppose, that it would be very little, except what the cost of administration would require; and this provision, of course, would be a very sweet morsel to gentlemen who are interested in the forest reservations or the projects improved thereon, and the same with reference to public lands, and the same with reference to the improvement of projects on navigable rivers not embraced within the limits of forest reserves.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In regard to the forest reserves and certain returns being "a sweet morsel," who could the returns be for, provided they are given to the forest reserves, but the forest reserves? Why change existing laws? And how are these great tracts which are forest reserves ever to become anything if a fair part of the returns from the resources within their boundaries do not return to them? Before the gentleman answers that, I suggest some other things to think about. The gentleman proposes to strike out everything in the paragraph except the lines relating to the proceeds of Indian reservations, which are to be given to the Indians on the reservations. What does the gentleman mean?

Mr. SIMS. I understand the Indians own that land, and they have the right to the revenues as to their lands.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do you mean the allottees to the lands that are held in abeyance? I happen to know of one place where 600 allotments have been prepared, but the land can not be or is not given. Do you deny to certain Indians the proceeds of the allotments given under treaty, to be held forever as long as grass grows and water runs?

Mr. SIMS. My idea about striking out everything was——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Even if you are going to strike out everything, do not divide the rights of the Indians.

Mr. SIMS. My idea was to preserve their rights, whatever they are.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is a sample of a few of the proposals in connection with this bill, which, if passed into law, will come back to make trouble for future Congresses and the western people.

Mr. SIMS. I will say to the gentleman that I am not familiar with these public-land questions, and inasmuch as the chairman of the Public Lands Committee and several other members of the Public Lands Committee were members of this committee I want that part of the bill, in so far as it may affect the public lands and forest reservations, to be considered and discussed and information concerning it given by the members of the Committee on the Public Lands and the members of the Committee on Agriculture, because I confess that I have not given it as much consideration as they have.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman would do well to include the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, because the Committee on the Public Lands does not pretend to know the rights of Indians on certain Indian reservations when it comes to so-called "conserved" things.

Mr. SIMS. Whether it is accomplished by the motion I have made or not, it is not intended to interfere with whatever is reserved to the Indians in this section.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. From 30 per cent up of the land in these great Western States is yet public domain, with all the resources thereon; and as we step into a process by which they are to be leased and again leased and leased again, leaving the people living on the outside to pay the great burden of the taxes, with a loss to them of the revenue from those natural resources which in other communities bear their share of the public expenses of the community, if the gentleman will consider these facts he will come sooner or later to the conclusion that the people who live in these new States and who support the schools and build the roads ought not to be entirely deprived or anywhere near deprived of the returns from those natural resources.

Mr. SIMS. That is a good argument to inject into my speech—perhaps better than I myself can make in the same line—but the gentleman must concede that he is taking up all my time. I have no motive at all in making this motion except that which I have expressed, which is that the revenue respecting all these things, except so far as they affect the Indians, shall not be disposed of as provided in this bill, because it so localizes those revenues that it might be very inequitable and unjust to the taxpayers of the country, who may have to pay for improvements in navigation that are not provided for under this.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman understands that Secretary Lane is in charge of the public lands and Secretary Houston is in charge of the forest reserves which are public lands, and if those two gentlemen have come to any conclusion as to where the proceeds shall go, why should this Congress on short notice and with no debate change the plan that is in the bill drafted by the Secretaries? Here apparently is a mere detail, but it is a very important one.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will remember that in the bill drafted by Mr. Merrill it was provided that there should be a minimum charge of 10 cents, which was to be applied to the cost of administration. Of course that is not the bill now, for there is no minimum or maximum charge provided in the bill. It is provided that there shall be a charge. Suppose they should make a charge of three or four dollars a horsepower. In some cases that might be a very just charge. Then, does the gentleman think these great developments in the West on public lands should all go as provided in section 17?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do; just as the resources of a State go to make the revenues of the State. And take the forest reserves which have been created since the gentleman has been in Congress. The gentleman knows that as a part of the Agricultural bill at each session of Congress there is carried an appropriation of $5,000,000, or more, out of the pockets of the people for the forest reserves. The returns from the forest reserves have never got above $3,000,000. Now, why not do a part toward making the forest reserves self-sustaining, even if the Government does own them?

Mr. SIMS. I wish the gentleman would speak in his own time. He is taking up all my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am willing that the gentleman should have all the time he wants, just so that I get some time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very strange proceeding. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], chairman of the committee, moves to strike out a portion of this bill about which he says he has no information whatever. His statement at least has the virtue of frankness, even if it does not furnish the House with any information. There were six members of the Water Power Committee who were also members of the Committee on the Public Lands. There were six members of that committee who were also members of the Committee on Agriculture. Those two committees have charge of all the legislation which relates to the public lands and the forest reserves, to which this particular section relates. The section has been very carefully worked out. Every effort was made to make it conform as far as it was possible to do it, to do substantial justice between the Government and the public and the States. No amendment to this section was proposed in the committee, and so far as those members of the Committee are concerned who are also members of the Committee on the Public Lands and members of the Committee on Agriculture, they seem to be entirely satisfied with it, and I do not know now why an effort should be made to abrogate entirely the theory upon which it was adopted, the theory which has obtained in both the forest reserves and the public lands for many years.

Mr. ESCH. There is a lot of other legislation framed on the same theory.

Mr. ANDERSON. And, as the gentleman from Wisconsin suggests, it is carried in a great deal of other legislation. The charges referred to in this amendment are rental charges arising out of the licenses. They have no relation whatever to the creation of amortization reserves, so that there is not anything in the suggestion that if this section is adopted in the form in which it now appears there can be no provision for the amortization of plants licensed under it. It seems to me we would do well, in this case, at least, to adhere to the well-considered judgment of the committee upon this section.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will not be adopted. Not that I am entirely satisfied with the provisions of the section; far from it. But I am endeavoring to help the committee pass their bill as they reported it, with as few changes as possible. Therefore I am willing to forego my own views and opinions with regard to certain details and accept the judgment of the committee. Several gentlemen well versed in public land and forest reserve matters were on the committee. The decision they reached with other members of the committee does not reflect my views of the matter altogether, but I have no doubt that they did the best they could.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I myself have never been on any committee that handled water-power legislation for public lands. I am not well acquainted with it. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] was not here, and I did not see anybody present to whose attention I could call the matter, and I made the motion to bring up the question for discussion rather than with the idea that it must be adopted. I intended to leave it to the members of the Public Lands Committee and those versed in that question. If they are opposed to it, I would withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss it so long as it has been raised, because it will undoubtedly be discussed in conference. Let me make this suggestion: This does not change existing law nearly as much as it appears to. My notion is that if the section were out, that all of the proceeds from these sources, obtained from the use of public lands, would go into the reclamation fund, for the law specifically provides that the receipts from public lands shall constitute the reclamation fund. Taking that view of it, I do not think the reclamation fund secures as much under this provision as it would without the section. There is, of course, ground for difference of opinion in regard to that matter. Now, with regard to the forest reserves, under existing law of the revenue from forest reserves 25 per cent goes to the State, to be paid to the county in which the revenues were obtained; 10 per cent is used for building roads in cooperation with the State. Under the good-roads law a still further 10 per cent is held for the purpose of reimbursing the Treasury for the expenditures under section 8 of the good-roads act.

All objection to the legislation lies in the fact that it constitutes a new and an additional fund on the forest reserves, when, in my opinion, it would have been better to have the money distributed as now provided by law.

There is this objectionable feature in the section, from my standpoint, and on that I pray the careful attention of all gentlemen who represent public-land States. There is no provision in the law now, no provision in this section, under which the communities where these plants may operate are to be reimbursed for withholding from taxation indefinitely the land used for power purposes. If these areas were very considerable, in course of time the loss of revenue to the State, which this section does not compensate for, would be considerable, and in some localities it might cripple the local authorities in carrying on the activities of local government.

I am very much in hopes that in the conference this section will be boiled down to about four lines, to wit, that the proceeds from the public lands shall be disposed of as the proceeds of public lands are now disposed of, adding to that a provision that a part of the proceeds shall go to the localities and that the proceeds on the forest reserves shall be disposed of as the proceeds from the forest reserves are now disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate at the expiration of five minutes, the gentleman from Wyoming to have two minutes. The chairman is going to withdraw his amendment, I understand.

Mr. WALSH. What is the use of discussing an amendment that is going to be withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as I said, the law now provides for the distribution of funds received from the forest reserves. All that is necessary to do is to provide that these funds shall be disposed of as other funds are disposed of. That is a simple and satisfactory way to dispose of it. When we come to the public lands they should be disposed of as other receipts have been disposed of, with the additional provision, which I think is important, although the land used will not be great in area—that a part of the proceeds should go to the localities for the purpose of maintaining schools and building roads.

Some such provision is important, but the paragraph is so long and involved there is no hope of amending it now. The committee did the best it could under the circumstances, I have no doubt, in the midst of conflicting opinions. Before the bill becomes a law I hope there will be some modification of it, and I feel confident that the gentlemen representing the Western States, who are familiar with these questions, who have drawn the provision, will, in their ability, work out of it something more simple and satisfactory.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use all of the three minutes in making the short statement I desire to make, as I have conferred with the chairman a little about it, and I am told that he expects to withdraw the amendment. It was, no doubt, very proper for the chairman to raise this question and move to strike it out so that the matter might be debated. It is also true that there is a well-defined element in the House who think it ought to be stricken out. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald, always moved to strike it out, and the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SHERLEY, has several times moved to strike it out. For myself, I have always thought it ought not to be stricken out. Under the reclamation law of 1902 the proceeds of all Government land go into the reclamation fund to irrigate the West. It is a rolling, revolving fund, and this is only carrying out that same principle. The House voted on this a number of times and has always stood by a provision similar to this. I am in hopes that the chairman will conclude that it is the part of wisdom to withdraw it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the proposed amendment.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which is a verbal amendment. Page 44, line 22, add the letter "s" to the word "forest."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 22, add the letter "s" to the word "forest."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire further recognition for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] with reference to the language on line 2, page 45. We state in the bill that all proceeds from any Indian reservation shall be applied to the credit of the Indians "on such reservations." Is it the case in Oklahoma, for instance, that many times Indians of a tribe are not on the reservation but have an interest in it?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that should be "of the reservation." This provision has no application to our State, because we have no public lands within the State of any kind to be leased or sold or other disposition made of them. It is true we have some Indian lands.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman's knowledge of Indian affairs would advise the House as to whether that should be as it is in the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the word "on" should be changed to the word "of." That was put in there at the suggestion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and worked out by the Interior Department. I care nothing about it. It has nothing to do with the Indians of my State, but it has to do with scattering Indian tribes throughout the country, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs wanted their lands developed and the proceeds to go into the Indian funds.

Mr. ESCH. It occurred to me that it may work an injustice to any Indians not actually on the reservation.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to substitute the word "of" for the word "on," in line 2, page 45.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 2, strike out the word "on" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the operation of any navigation facilities which may be constructed as a part of or in connection with any dam or diversion structure built under the provisions of this act, whether at the expense of a licensee hereunder or of the United States, shall at all times be controlled by such reasonable rules and regulations in the interest of navigation, including the control of the level of the pool caused by such dam or diversion structure, may be made from time to time by the Secretary of War. Such rules and regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such licensee at its own expense of such lights and signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War, and such fishways as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce; and for willful failure to comply with any such rule or regulation such licensee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as provided in section 25 hereof.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another verbal amendment, on page 45, line 17, after the word "structure," to insert the word "as." I think that was an oversight.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 17, after the word "structure," insert the word "as."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. In line 22, page 45, I find the language—and for willful failure to comply with any such rule or regulation.

Suppose there is a mere failure to comply with the regulations that the Secretary of War has prescribed respecting the level of the pool, or the Secretary of Commerce has prescribed respecting the construction and maintenance of fishways, would that be considered willful?

Mr. SIMS. It would not, and I do not think "willful" ought to be in there, and I did all I could to keep the committee from putting it in. That is all I have to say about that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Then I shall ask the gentleman from Wisconsin: Suppose the company failed to comply with the rules prescribed by the Secretary of War touching the maintenance of the level of the pools, or by the Secretary of Commerce touching the maintenance and construction of fishways. Suppose there was just a mere failure, would that be willful?

Mr. ESCH. It would have reference to section 25 of the bill, which provides:

SEC. 25. That any licensee, or any person, who shall willfully fail or who shall refuse to comply with any of the provisions of this act, or with any of the conditions made in part of any license issued hereunder, or with any subpœna of the commission, or with any regulation or lawful order of the commission, or of the Secretary of War, issued or made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall, in the discretion of the court, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed or provided by law.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The use of the word "willful" is rather unusual. The usual language is that if a person fails or refuses to do such a thing he shall be punished. What was the purpose of the use of the word "willful"?

Mr. ESCH. That had not been brought to my attention, but it occurred to me, in view of the fact that all of these conditions are practically specified in the license, the licensee can no longer plead ignorance, and therefore if he fails to comply it would be a willful failure.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? If he had ever lived under a carpetbag rule or bureaucratic control the gentleman would realize that it is very dangerous to have merely a failure to comply with some petty rule or regulation a ground for forfeiting all his rights or putting him in jail. It is very important that the word "willful" should remain in there. We certainly should give these people some "show for their white alley" before cutting them off. We discussed this matter at some length, and, while it is true the chairman did not want it in there, I felt it was only fair and just to the people who spend their money and try to comply with the law at least to have them knowingly do something wrong before they are penalized. That is a principle of the criminal law, that a man is not ordinarily a criminal without intentionally doing something wrong. In other words, he might omit to do something by reason of something entirely beyond his control. There is no provision of that kind in the bill. If we put in a clause relieving him from things beyond his control, that would not be so bad; but there is nothing of that kind in it, and therefore I feel that this word ought to be left in.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, personally I think it is just as strong without the word "willful" as with it in, but I do not make any suggestion or offer any amendment to strike it out and withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That when said power or any part thereof shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce the rates charged and the service rendered by any such licensee, or by any subsidiary corporation, the stock of which is owned or controlled directly or indirectly by such licensee, or by any person, corporation, or association purchasing power from such licensee for sale and distribution or use in public service shall be reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and just to the consumer, and all unreasonable, discriminatory, and unjust rates or services are hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful; and whenever any of the States directly concerned has not provided a commission or other authority to enforce the requirements of this section within such State, or to regulate and control the amount and character of securities to be issued by any of such parties or such States are unable to agree through their properly constituted authorities on the services to be rendered or on the rates or charges of payment therefor, or on the amount or character of securities to be issued by any of said parties, jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the commission, upon complaint of any person aggrieved, upon the request of any State concerned, or upon its own initiative to enforce the provisions of this section, to regulate and control so much of the services rendered, and of the rates and charges of payment therefor as constitute interstate or foreign commerce and to regulate the issuance of securities by the parties included within this section.

The administration of the provisions of this section, so far as applicable, shall be according to the procedure and practice in fixing and regulating the rates, charges, and practices of railroad companies as provided in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, and that the parties subject to such regulation shall have the same rights of hearing, defense, and review as said companies in such cases.

In any valuation of the property of any licensee hereunder for purposes of rate making, no value shall be claimed by the licensee or allowed by the commission, for any project or projects under license in excess of the value or values prescribed in section 14 hereof for the purposes of purchase by the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, Is there any provision in this bill to enable the commission or any authority to regulate the issuance of stock of these companies? The commission has the power to control and regulate the water that passes through the turbines. Is there any authority given to any governmental agency to regulate the water that enters into the stock of these companies?

Mr. SIMS. I think that would be a most important regulation, and I think it is embraced in the bill because applications have to be made to the commission for the purpose of issuing stocks and bonds, and they must have the approval of the commission, and I think that kind of water, referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi, who has had so much to do with other sorts of water, ought to be carefully kept out, and I hope it will be.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Undoubtedly I agree with the gentleman, but I just wondered if there was provision made in the bill to prevent the watering of this stock?

Mr. SIMS. The power is given to prevent that, and that is all we can do.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to section 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, just a moment; I do not think section 21 has been read.

Mr. STEELE. No, sir.

Mr. SIMS. This is to be offered to that section?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The section ought to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Temporarily the gentleman withdraws his amendment until the section can be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That when the grantee is a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public utility or service corporation, and can not acquire by contract or pledges the right to use or damage the lands or property of others necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any dam, reservoir, diversion structure, or the works appurtenant or accessory thereto, it may acquire the same by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located, or in the State courts.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment. I move to strike out the word "grantee" and substitute "licensee" therefor, in line 21, page 48. It is a clerical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 21, strike out the word "grantee" and insert in lieu thereof the word "licensee."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STEELE: On page 49, line 3, section 21, strike out all after the word "by" and the remaining lines in said section and insert the following: "causing to be made an accurate map of such lands or property, showing the location, quantity and character of each parcel of such lands or property to be taken for such purpose, with the names of the respective owners inscribed thereon, which shall be filed, recorded, and duly indexed in the public records of the office where the title of such lands is or may be recorded, and from and after the date of filing and recording such map, the several tracts or parcels of land or property mentioned or described thereon to be so taken shall be held as condemned for public uses, and when the grantee is a municipal corporation or a political subdivision of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, the right to use or damage such lands or property shall vest in such grantee; but when such grantee is other than a State or municipal or quasi-municipal corporation or agency, just compensation for such right to use or damage such lands or property shall be first paid or secured before such right shall vest in such grantee. If the grantee shall be unable, within 30 days after the filing of such map and notice of the same to the respective owners of such lands or property, to agree upon just compensation for the right to use or damage such lands or property, either the grantee or owner or owners of such lands or property may proceed by judicial process in the courts of the State wherein such lands or property is located for the ascertainment of such compensation, in accordance with the practice, pleadings, forms, and procedure existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of such State."

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, one amendment has already been adopted to this bill recognizing that the banks of a navigable stream and the bed of a stream are within State jurisdiction. Now, the purpose of this amendment is in further recognition of that right and to do three things. First, to protect the rights of the local landowner, so that he shall not be compelled in order that his damages may be ascertained to proceed several hundred miles to a Federal court with his witnesses and be placed to that expense in order that his damages may be properly ascertained by a judicial judgment. The purpose of this amendment is to vest jurisdiction in the local State tribunal for the purpose of the ascertainment of the damages of the local landowner. In the next place the purpose is to retain efficiency in land titles in the local State record, so as to give notice that if any land of a local landowner is condemned for public purposes and taken from him, that any purchaser of the land title should have notice of the fact that the land actually condemned has been removed from the ownership and title of the local landowner. As it is now there will be no such notice whatever.

Now, in the third place, it is intended to facilitate the progress which may be made in furtherance of the exercise of the powers vested under this act. As it is now, there is simply the exercise of the right of eminent domain vested in the licensee, and in order to exercise that power, if the power is resisted by the local landowner, it will be necessary for the licensee to go into court and have a judicial judgment—the verdict of a jury, possibly—before he can use the land he desires to have condemned. This might delay his proceeding for possibly months or years. As it is proposed under this amendment you have the right given to a subdivision of a State or a municipality to condemn at once, and the taxing power of that municipality is ordinarily sufficient security for the payment of the damages. But where it is a local public-service corporation, why, manifestly, they should give security before the land is actually taken. And therefore it is intended to facilitate the progress under this act by, in the first place, giving the local landowner adequate remedy in the State courts for the recovery or ascertainment of his damages. In the second place, there should be placed of record in the local office where land titles are held in the States notice of the fact that this land has been condemned and drawn from the ownership of the local landowner. And, in the next place, it is intended to facilitate the progress referred to.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman's amendment, and I think it is well conceived. I call the gentleman's attention to one detail of it. The provision is that one who is to undertake the project shall not take the land until the purchase price is paid or secured. Does not the gentleman think the term "secured" should be a little bit more elaborately expressed, that security for the payment, by bond or any form satisfactory to a local court, shall be given?

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman will see, if he will read the amendment carefully, that the security to be given only applies to a public-service corporation. It does not apply to municipal corporations or quasi-municipal corporations. There is a distinction between the two. The taxing authority in the one case is sufficient. In the other it is intended that the damages should be paid or secured, and my idea was that the word "secured" should cover the condition the gentleman has suggested.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I will.

Mr. SIMS. I notice the gentleman used the term "grantee" in several places. Does the gentleman use it in lieu of "licensee"?

Mr. STEELE. Yes; it was so intended, because the word "grantee" was used in the act when I framed the amendment. But the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has offered an amendment, and I ask that where the word "grantee" is used that the word "licensee" shall be substituted.

Mr. SIMS. Of course, there is no objection to that.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent that wherever the word "grantee" is used in the amendment, the word "licensee" shall be substituted for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made accordingly.

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman's amendment require the money to be paid in advance, before condemnation?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir. It goes to this extent: Section 21 only applies to two classes of corporations, public corporations, like municipalities or agencies, of a State or quasi-municipal corporation in the one class, and in the other are public-service corporations, which have a private side to them. So far as the public corporations are concerned, they can proceed without any security whatever. The taxing power there is sufficient to secure it. But in the case of a public-service corporation, which may have its property all mortgaged, it is provided that the damages be first secured.

Mr. SIMS. I had the pleasure of reading the gentleman's amendment, and so far as I could see I thought it was a good one, and I have not changed my mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. The bill as now drawn follows the well-understood principle in this House, and that is to provide that wherever proceedings are brought in the courts of the country for any purpose those proceedings shall be in conformity with the general laws of the State relating to the particular procedure adopted.

Now, the gentleman proposes to substitute for this general and well-accepted practice, which is found in a number of the statutes of the United States, and which is in accordance with the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States, a method of acquiring property under eminent domain which he himself has drawn. There is perhaps no objection to the method which he proposes, except that it is not in conformity with the accepted practice in many States. And wherever any action is sought to be brought under the provisions of this section it would be necessary to follow the particular line of procedure which he has laid down, which might be and probably would be inconsistent with the practice and the procedure which obtains in many of the States. It does not seem to me to be wise, however well this amendment has been drawn and however well it may seem to suit the purposes of this section, to deviate from the well-accepted principles upon which legislation of this character has always proceeded in the past. I trust the amendment will not be adopted, because nobody knows, if it is adopted, what its effect will be upon the practice as to condemnation proceedings in the various State and Federal courts throughout the Union.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. Does not the original section as now phrased provide for jurisdiction of the State courts?

Mr. ANDERSON. I understood the gentleman struck out that part and provides a method of procedure of his own.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no. It provides for the procedure of the State courts, whatever that may be, the idea being to simply localize this remedy, so that local landowners shall not be compelled to go several hundred miles distant to a Federal court to have their rights determined, but that they shall be determined under the laws of the respective States.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is what the section provides now. The condemnation proceedings, of course, would be in accordance with the general rules in the respective States.

Mr. STEELE. It provides for Federal jurisdiction also.

Mr. ANDERSON. Both State and Federal jurisdiction, which is necessary under the circumstances of this case. For instance, in the case of a boundary water between two States, obviously the Federal jurisdiction ought to attach there, and it would not be proper in such a case to confine the jurisdiction to the States. It seems to me we will follow the wise course here if we follow the procedure and the practice which is known to lawyers and to the people of the country everywhere, and with which they are familiar, and according to which they can practice, without inserting in here a new provision, which must be subject to entirely new construction by the courts before anybody will know how to proceed under it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I have an agreement, if I can, as to further debate on this amendment? I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. STEELE. I may want three minutes, possibly.

Mr. SIMS. Then make it eight minutes. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of the amendment is no doubt a good one, but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact—and I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] will agree—that this bill simply gives the right of eminent domain, nothing more and nothing less. It extends to a municipality or a corporation and an individual——

Mr. STEELE. Not to an individual.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; under this act.

Mr. STEELE. No.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes. All those that have the right to secure under the State; that when the licensee is a municipal corporation or a political subdivision of a State or a public service of a State or a public utility or service corporation.

Mr. STEELE. It does not apply to individuals here.

Mr. RAKER. There is extended the right of eminent domain. This does not lay down the procedure in the Federal courts or in the State courts.

Now, the only trouble I see in the amendment of the gentleman is that he lays down a practice or procedure which will supersede the practice in the State courts, wherein it differs from the amendment proposed. You will have to go to this bill and find out and follow this particular change wherein it is different from the present law as to procedure only in eminent domain. The rules and regulations are well established in the Federal courts as to eminent domain, where the right is granted in various State courts, and many of them differ. The rules of practice and procedure, and so forth, are different in the various State courts as to eminent domain. But the gentleman here tries to fix under this particular bill various rules and conditions that are not applicable to any but a few of the States, if any of them, at the present time.

Mr. STEELE. Is it not generally applicable to condemnations by railroad corporations?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. STEELE. It absolutely is.

Mr. RAKER. No; and for this reason: If a railroad is given the right of eminent domain—and practically in all of the States it is—the railroad company must comply with the procedure and the court practice in the State wherein it proceeds to use its right of eminent domain granted by the State, and must follow that procedure. Now, the procedure in the courts of California is different in some respects from the procedure in the courts of Pennsylvania, but each lawyer knows—each one practicing in those various courts knows exactly—what his pleading must contain, what the evidence must be, what his bond must be, and exactly what he must do to reap the benefit of the statute giving him the right of eminent domain.

I am afraid the gentleman's amendment is a confusion instead of a clarification of what is wanted, because practically all of the States have in their view a sufficient and ample law as to the practice and the procedure when the right is given in eminent domain. If they have not, they can change them. And, further, wherever one in the Federal court proceeds to obtain and enforce his right to eminent domain, it being a civil case, he follows the law of that State. Is not that rght, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STEELE. So far as it does not conflict with Federal procedure.

Mr. RAKER. Exactly. Therefore we have now a uniform procedure that each State, and the practitioners and those desiring to apply the procedure can exercise the right of eminent domain in full force and effect, and it is well understood, and there is no provision here that is in any wise more beneficial than in most of the States to-day. I am just thinking that the gentleman's amendment will confuse rather than clarify the entire situation, and that we had better leave the law as it stands to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], it seems to me, has a very confused thought of the purpose of the amendment. This amendment, instead of confusing the situation is going to clarify it, and particularly for the benefit of the local landowner. The local landowner whose land is about to be taken is entitled to have notice of the fact that his land is about to be taken, and the quantity of land that is to be taken, so that he can go to the proper office and ascertain that it is about to be taken.

Mr. RAKER. Right there, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEELE. If it does not occupy my time unnecessarily.

Mr. RAKER. In every condemnation proceeding in the complaint must not the plaintiff allege and describe the land by metes and bounds, and in addition attach a plat to his complaint?

Mr. STEELE. That only applies when you get into court, and your proceeding simply means that every case would have to go to the Federal court, and the local landowner would probably have to go several hundred miles with his witnesses in order that his amount of damages might be ascertained in the Federal court. It would be a bad thing also for the promotion of the purposes of this act, because against the objection of the local landowner the licensee could not use this land or condemn until there was a judgment rendered by a jury in a Federal court and it was actually condemned and damages determined. He would be injured to that extent.

Now, when the gentleman talked about it being different from the procedure in the several States he failed to observe the last provision in this amendment, which is that "the proceedings in the State courts shall be in accordance with the practice, pleading, forms, and procedure existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of such State." It preserves the procedure absolutely in the courts of the different States. It is for the betterment of the act. It will facilitate the purposes of the act, and it will protect the local landowner in his rights, and the purchasers can ascertain in the local land office what land is actually owned by the landowner. Without this amendment there will be no public record from which this information can be ascertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 13.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking any permit or valid existing right of way heretofore granted, or as revoking any authority heretofore given pursuant to law, but any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality, holding or possessing such permit, right of way, or authority may retain the same subject to the conditions set forth in the grant thereof and subject to any and all rules and regulations applicable thereto and existing at the date of the approval of this act, or may apply for a license hereunder and upon such application the commission may issue to any such applicant a license in accordance with the provisions of this act, and in such case the provisions of this act shall apply to such applicant as a licensee hereunder.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia.) The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 49, line 25, strike out the words "retain the same," and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 50.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I would like the attention of the members of the committee touching the amendment that I have proposed. The purpose of this section is to provide that any municipalities, persons, associations, and so forth, that have already received permits may retain them, so far as this law is concerned, but that the concern shall have the opportunity to apply for a license under the provisions of the present law. It occurs to me that the language I have suggested to be stricken out is unfortunate. I believe we may be doing a good deal more—in fact, vastly more—than we have had in mind to do, and I suggest that if we strike out these words it will leave the situation as it ought to be, reading—

That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking any permit or valid existing right of way heretofore granted, or as revoking any authority heretofore given pursuant to law, but any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality, holding or possessing such permit, right of way, or authority may apply for a license hereunder, and upon such application the commission may issue to any such applicant a license in accordance with the provisions of this act, and in such case the provisions of this act shall apply to such applicant as a licensee hereunder.

Now, that leaves the situation just as it ought to be left. We do not confirm anything. We leave it subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, or the Secretary of War, as the case may be, to do or not to do, under the permit that has been issued, that which the respective Secretaries have the power now to do.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Is it the gentleman's idea that by leaving the language as we have it in the bill there may be danger of confirming by this act of Congress some act of prior grantees beyond the jurisdiction granted under their licenses?

Mr. FRENCH. That is precisely the question I raise. We do not know, and I suppose it would take each department a week or more, possibly, to find out precisely the terms of each particular permit that has been issued, and to know that the grants of the permit were not in excess of law. Of course, we must assume that all permits heretofore granted have been granted in good faith, but we do not know that a permit may have been issued and in perfect good faith in excess of the authority conferred upon the department that issued the same. Now, the lines that I suggest be stricken out leave the bill so that the grantees may retain their grants, subject to the conditions set forth in the grants and subject to any and all rules and regulations applicable thereto and existing at the date of the approval of this act. It seems to me we are confirming en bloc a lot of permits that may have been issued in accordance with existing law or may have been issued in excess of authority assumed by those having the authority to issue permits under the law under which they were acting.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Where people have spent large amounts of money and have clearly recognized legal and equitable rights now, and have initiated a tentative title, would it not be right for them to be permitted to go ahead under the existing law and regulations rather than force them to surrender their rights and to come in under this new law?

Mr. FRENCH. My amendment leaves the situation so that the particular officer can handle that question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But ought not the men who are in possession now to have the right to go ahead? In other words, ought we to rip up vested rights? I understand there are thousands of rights of various kinds that may be affected by this bill. Should we not allow them to go ahead if they can and want to under the existing law? We do not want to confiscate them and make them trespassers in case they do not immediately surrender everything and come in under this bill. If they prefer to do so they should have the alternative of coming in under this law. The way the section is written it gives them two chances rather than one.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; and so does my amendment. I do not believe that we rip up existing rights, so far as that is concerned, but I do believe that if the language of the bill is permitted to go into the law we will confirm en bloc a lot of permits and conditions that we do not know anything about. We do not know what we may be confirming. We may be confirming permits that impose conditions in excess of existing law. If so, the fact that we pass a law confirming them will grant them absolutely to the grantees.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This section does not confirm them at all. It allows them to go ahead if they can and perfect their title and continue business under the existing laws, rules, and regulations. I do not think we should make this provision either retroactive or confiscatory.

Mr. FRENCH. No; I think the gentleman does not read the section accurately. The language I propose to strike out is the language which says that these grantees may retain the same subject to the conditions set forth in the grant thereof, and so forth.

Mr. DEMPSEY. They may retain what they have; that is all. They do not get any more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. This is a very important question. I hope there may be no reason for concern, but it seems to me here is a place where we ought to stop and look and listen and not simply confirm a lot of rights that may have been granted that we do not know anything about.

Mr. SIMS. Has the time of the gentleman from Idaho been extended five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask that all debate upon this amendment and amendments to the same close in five minutes after the expiration of the time of the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would like to have two minutes.

Mr. SIMS. The other five minutes to be divided between the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of the five minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Idaho the next five minutes be divided between the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], and that at the end of that time debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto shall be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to say that I am in entire accord with what I think is the purpose of the gentleman from Idaho; but the members of the committee discussed this matter rather fully, as I recollect it, and believed if we did not put that clause in all the people on the public domain who had vested rights might be down and out, or they would have to at once come in under this law. We felt that it was not treating them fair and might be legislating them out of existing rights. What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. FRENCH. I think that question is met in the first lines of the bill, and under these lines we do not disturb existing conditions. If we keep the language in which I propose to strike out, we will confirm existing conditions without knowing what we are confirming.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. If that is true, at the end of the bill you repeal the law he is acting under and do not permit it to remain, and he must quit there and his plant must stop.

Mr. FRENCH. We do not repeal it.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; at the end of the act is the repealing clause. Here is a million-dollar plant and the man can not move and you deprive him of all the property that he has invested in it.

Mr. FRENCH. In the first part of the bill there is a provision that the act shall not be construed to revoke any permit, and so forth, and the repealing section to which Judge RAKER refers specifically exempts anything that may not be inconsistent with the pending bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. While I am in entire sympathy with what the gentleman has in mind, the language of the section, I think, is adequate for his purpose. It provides that he may retain the same subject to the conditions set forth in the grant. He may retain what? He may retain the same, and that is to permit of the existing rights and the authority that he has—that and nothing more. It does not extend it; it does not make it any better; it does not give him any more, but gives him authority to retain what he has, good or bad or indifferent, and that is all the effect of this section.

Mr. FRENCH. I hope the gentleman is correct; and if so, there will be no trouble. But I fear that the language that I propose be stricken out permits powers in excess of the law under which the permit was issued to be ratified and confirmed. It seems to me that under the gentleman's interpretation it is a duplication of language, and if it is not that, then it is granting and confirming conditions that the House does not know anything about.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that these provisions have been examined by the Interior and Agricultural Departments and this language is virtually their language. This special water-power committee feel that where people now have legally recognized rights of various kinds, we did not want to rip them up. We wanted them to be allowed to go ahead, if they can and want to, and also give them the opportunity, if they prefer to do so, to come in under the law.

Mr. FRENCH. If you strike out the language I propose you leave all rights protected under existing law. The language of the section specifically says that the existing rights heretofore granted shall not be considered as being revoked; and on the other hand, following up the line, under the language I propose to strike out we give them the alternative of coming in under the conditions of this measure.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, section 29 reads as follows:

That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Now, this provision intends that the present existing licenses granted to these parties which are revocable shall not be revoked by this law, but that they may under the conditions of the law now in existence proceed with their work. If you strike out the language and repeal the law relating to the permits you will find perhaps a man that has expended $500,000 or $1,000,000 can not move one way or the other. He must come in under the provisions of this act or his property is confiscated.

Mr. FRENCH. The language in the act is "not inconsistent with the language of this act," and in the very first part of section 23 you provide a specific exception.

Mr. RAKER. No; you repeal all the law relating to these matters, and a man who has a permit now in existence can not proceed unless under the provisions of this act. The man who has a permit which is not revoked can proceed under the rules and regulations of the law now in existence—

Rules and regulations applicable thereto and existing at the date of the approval of this act.

That is the law in force to-day under which he has made his application, and the amendment of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] simply knocks out all of the foundation of the man's project and leaves his property practically confiscated, instead of allowing him to proceed under the law as it exists, or, if he wants to, he can come under provisions of this act by complying with its terms.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, my idea about the matter is that the intention of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] is the same as ours, but the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and myself are on this Water Power Committee, and we have gone over this matter quite fully. I think it would be dangerous for us to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho. We have tried to jealously guard the existing rights of the people, especially upon the public domain, people who have had licenses or obtained permits or special acts of Congress, and I either do not understand the gentleman's amendment or else it takes away, or may take away, the rights under the existing law and virtually forces them to come in and proceed under this new law or become trespassers and be thrown out.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In a moment. Our thought was that if a man can go ahead and perfect his title under the existing law, he ought to be given the right to do so, if he so desires, and if he does not want to, then we should give him the option of coming in under this law. That is one of the things that all of the western Members have earnestly and jealously guarded against—not to legislate a man out of his existing rights, either in agricultural claims or water rights or coal or oil or in other claims, but let him, if he can, go ahead and perfect his title under the existing law, or give him the option, if he finds he can not get by, if he can not run the gauntlet of red tape and get title, then to have a preference to come in under this law. I do not understand that the gentleman's amendment even gives him a preference right to come in.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes, indeed, it does.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I feel the gentleman has not had the matter sufficiently worked out. Ordinarily his amendments are very good, but I seriously doubt the wisdom of accepting this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if upon a matter of this kind, which I believe to be of tremendous importance, we ought not to have a little more time. I would like to ask unanimous consent that we have 20 minutes more.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, this is a matter that can be worked out in conference.

Mr. SIMS. This bill has got to be passed to-day or it goes into limbo. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRENCH) there were—ayes 10, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. That any lands of the United States included in any proposed project under the provisions of this act shall from the date of filing of application therefor be reserved from entry, location, or other disposal under the laws of the United States until otherwise directed by the commission or by Congress. Notice that such application has been made, together with the date of filing thereof and a description of the lands of the United States affected thereby, shall be filed in the local land office for the district in which such lands are located. Whenever the commission shall determine that the value of any lands of the United States so applied for, or heretofore or hereafter reserved or classified as power sites, will not be injured or destroyed for the purposes of power development by location, entry, or selection under the public-land laws, the Secretary of the Interior, upon notice of such determination, shall declare such lands open to location, entry, or selection, subject to and with a reservation of the right of the United States or its permittees or licensees to enter upon, occupy, and use any part or all of said lands necessary, in the judgment of the commission, for the purposes of this act, which right shall be expressly reserved in every patent issued for such lands; and no claim or right to compensation shall accrue from the occupation or use of any of said lands for said purposes. The United States or any licensee for any such lands hereunder may enter thereupon for the purposes of this act, upon payment of any damages to crops, buildings, or other improvements caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond to the United States for the use and benefit of the owner to secure the payment of such damages as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond in a court of competent jurisdiction, said bond to be in the form prescribed by the commission: Provided, That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore made for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section contained.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is one of these great big subjects involved in this bill, and while it does not contain such restrictions and limitations at is ought to, yet I was unable to secure a modification of it in the committee. I will be in like position, I believe, before the House, and all I desire to say to my friends from the West who have been in season and out of season talking about reservations is this, that while I do not agree with them in all their views, I believe in reservation when it is reserved for conservation and actually used now or prepared for use instead of tying it up for the long distant future. In other words, reservation or conservation is use, use to the utmost by the present generation and on and on as it can be properly used without any detriment to the public; but at the same time not turning it over to private concerns or corporations in perpetuity. I feel that I ought to call the attention of these gentlemen to the first six and a half lines of this section. I suppose it may be necessary, but as a matter of fact this will in the future practically reserve all of our public lands in the West. That is just about what it means. Whether it is good faith or bad faith, it will have to be determined; but whenever a corporation, individual, or association makes this application and says it wants the waters of a certain stream and all its tributaries and includes in that 100 or 5,000 acres, every acre of that land then within that application is reserved from public use until set aside or released from withdrawal by act of the commission or act of Congress. Just how that could be eliminated I do not know. The provision reads:

That any lands of the United States included in any proposed project under the provisions of this act shall from the date of filing of application therefor be reserved from entry, location, or other disposal under the laws of the United States until otherwise directed by the commission or by Congress.

I am wondering just how I will be able to analyze this act. It prevents all mining entries within the area of the selection lands for reservoir sites. It prohibits all desert-land entries that may be made within the land in the application. It prohibits all homestead entries within the boundaries of the lands included in this application, so while it is not intended and undoubtedly was not the purpose of those who presented the bill or of the committee, because they did not see this, yet I feel that there ought to have been some limitation. But, as a matter of fact, it is one general reservation of all the public lands in the United States wherein anybody may file an application for a power site, and the only way to get it reviewed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Whereby the application may be set aside is by order of the commission changing or relieving certain tracts of land for homestead or desert or mining purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Would it not very greatly help this matter if we would add after the word "Congress," in line 14, page 50, the words "or the Secretary of the Interior"?

Now, I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are a number of places in this bill where matters are purely within the purview of the Secretary of War, or entirely within the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, or the Secretary of Agriculture, and no one else has anything really to do with them, and we have given them some individual discretion as I recall now. And I feel that these lands belonging to the United States entirely, where a man has got a homestead or other claim, or where there might be mining claims developed, that the Secretary of the Interior ought to have the sole authority, without going through the cumbersome regulation of the commission, or an act of Congress, to segregate or open it up to that extent. And I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that ought to be amended that way?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there is no amendment before the House; there is nothing pending.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am going to offer one.

Mr. SIMS. I shall have to object. Gentlemen are speaking to no amendment at all. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. MADDEN. I am glad the chairman of the committee has characterized this kind of discussion.

Mr. RAKER. I am proceeding to discuss the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. But there is no amendment whatever.

Mr. RAKER. This is not coming out of my time, is it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time, it has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may proceed for three minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I shall object unless some amendment is offered. That is the only way I know of of getting through with this bill at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman mean to object?

Mr. SIMS. Unless an amendment is offered, and then, of course, they can discuss it, but this discussion is going on without anything pending.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks for five additional minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section close in five minutes, three to be yielded to the gentleman from California and two to the gentleman from Washington, and, Mr. Chairman, I hope they will talk to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. SIMS. Three minutes to the gentleman from California and two to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand these gentlemen are going to talk to the amendment?

Mr. SIMS. They are going to talk to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. We have had the time of five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will confine himself to that.

Mr. SIMS. They will do it.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman's fears will not be——

Mr. MADDEN. I realize the gentleman has no other motive than to talk to this, but I have not heard him talking to it yet.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has not been in the room listening.

Mr. MADDEN. I have been right here listening.

Mr. RAKER. I am afraid my voice is so low the gentleman did not hear me.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman will take up his five minutes talking about the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes, three to be consumed by the gentleman from California and two by the gentleman from Washington, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall terminate. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment to be added that debate shall be confined to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. These five minutes are extended under the rule——

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes has been agreed upon, three to be consumed by the gentleman from California and two by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. RAKER. If I gather the full purport of the question of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], my view is the same as that of that gentleman on that question, but sometimes we can not get the amendments through we would desire. I am talking to this amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I am talking of what it means. I can see a man filing an application in my district covering a million acres under this law whereby every improvement on that land in the way of future homesteading, future desert-land entries, future mining entries, would be absolutely blocked until the land was released by the commission or by Congress. I can see myself working here for the next 40 years in getting homestead and desert-land claims and mining claims released from this kind of application for the good, honest citizens of this country who want to go there and live and develop it as they ought to. I want to call it to the attention of the House now, so when this gets in conference we will have this amendment as it ought to be.

Mr. MADDEN. I congratulate the gentleman in his assurance that he is going to be here for the next 40 years.

Mr. RAKER. I have not the assurance of anything. The only assurance I have in this matter is that you should do your duty fearlessly and well, and when you have done that you will get recognition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, attention has been called to this paragraph and to the fact that under it we will still further tie up much of the available public land, and therefore I have offered the motion to strike out the paragraph. I think nothing can be lost to the bill by striking this whole paragraph out. All the public lands are now so fettered with reservations withholding them from entry that there is very little of any value left that can be taken without more effort than it is worth.

The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is quite right. We have tied up too much. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] that the proposed withdrawal might be with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, whose department, he says, takes care of the public lands, will not help, because a great part of the public land—all the forest reserves—is in the control of the Secretary of Agriculture. To strike out the whole paragraph would leave public lands to be held and handled as they are now handled and to be released as they are released now by the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, as occasion requires.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman's motion will not carry, but that we will have this thing gone over in conference.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from California did not mean what he said when he asked to have this release. He was simply talking for the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: "Strike out all of section 24."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Would it be in order to amend that amendment by confining it to the first six lines, beginning with line 9 and ending with the word "Congress" in line 14?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would be glad to withdraw my amendment and let that amendment be offered.

Mr. SIMS. Modify your own amendment, so that there will be no more debate.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask to modify the amendment by striking out the first six lines, as indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

Modified amendment: Page 50, beginning with the word "that," in line 9, strike out all down to and including the word "Congress," in line 14.

Mr. MADDEN. How will it read, then?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] meant down to and including the word "located" in line 18.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I guess that would make the grammatical construction better. I would ask that the amendment extend down to the word "located" in line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to further modify the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the modified amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment: Page 50, line 9, after the word "that," strike out all down to and including the word "located," in line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That any licensee, or any persons, who shall willfully fail or who shall refuse to comply with any of the provisions of this act, or with any of the conditions made a part of any license issued hereunder, or with any subpœna of the commission, or with any regulation or lawful order of the commission, or of the Secretary of War, issued or made in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall, in the discretion of the court, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed or provided by law; and every month any such licensee, or any such person, shall remain in default after written notice from the commission, or from the Secretary of War, shall be deemed a new and separate offense punishable as aforesaid.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 52, line 2, after the word "War," insert "or of the Secretary of Commerce as to fishways."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Page 52, line 2, after the word "War," insert "or of the Secretary of Commerce as to fishways."

Mr. SIMS. There is no objection to the amendment that I know of.

Mr. RAKER. I do not see why you want to modify this bill and legislate in favor of the Secretary of Commerce and take it away from the commission, and legislate in favor of the Secretary of War and take it away from the commission. I can not understand the provision.

Mr. ESCH. On page 45, in section 18, we already provide—

Such rules and regulations may include the maintenance and operation by such licensee at its own expense of such lights and signals as may be directed by the Secretary of War, and such fishways as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce.

In the pending section we provide the penalty for failure to obey the rules and regulations specified in the license or made by the commission or made by the Secretary of War, but we omitted to put in the Secretary of Commerce, so that you can have some compelling force if the licensee did not put in fishways upon order of the Secretary of Commerce. If you do not put that in, you can build these great structures, especially in the West, where fishing is a large industry, and refuse to put them in, and to the injury of the fishing industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Line 7, page 52, strike out the word "month" and insert "week."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 52, line 7, strike out the word "month" and insert the word "week."

Mr. RAKER. The only difference between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and myself in regard to the fishways was that the commission could handle it; but now, with the very thing he has inserted here, a man may violate the law for a month and destroy all the fish in a stream. I think, if it is a made a week, he can not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I think we should also insert, in line 10, page 52, after the word "War," the words "or from the Secretary of Commerce."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 10, after the word "War," insert the words "or from the Secretary of Commerce."

Mr. SIMS. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what authority the Secretary of Commerce has under the provisions of this act?

Mr. ESCH. As to what?

Mr. WALSH. You are inserting here a written notice from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Commerce. Now, what authority has the Secretary of Commerce under this act which would make it necessary for him to give a written notice?

Mr. ESCH. I offered an amendment before to line 2, page 52, which the House has already inserted. Having already inserted it there, it is necessary also to insert it in line 10.

The Bureau of Fisheries is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce, and in section 18 we give the Secretary of Commerce the right to prescribe fishways in these dams. But we do not prescribe any penalty if they are not put in on the order of the Secretary of Commerce. Hence we thought it best to insert it in section 25, so as to give him the necessary power.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman also state whether, in addition to giving these three Cabinet officers control of the water powers in navigable streams of the country, we have imposed on the Secretary of Commerce authority to say where fishways shall be placed in navigable streams, irrespective of what the State commission may think about it?

Mr. ESCH. I think that a Federal agency should be given this power, so that it could be exercised at the same time that the dam itself is constructed and not keep its construction dependent upon the uncertain authority exercised by a State, some of the States not having any authority under existing law for the creation of fishways.

Mr. WALSH. But the States have the authority to prescribe fishing regulations within all waters within their own boundaries, provided that the regulations they prescribe shall not interfere with the right of navigation. Now, you come in and say, no matter what the State fish commission may decide with regard to regulations, the Secretary of Commerce may come in and supersede him.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. ESCH. If I have the floor, I will.

Mr. WALSH. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if I may.

Mr. WALSH. I want first to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if my interpretation of section 18 is correct, that notwithstanding what the State fish commission may prescribe in the nature of regulations, the Secretary of Commerce may come in and supersede those regulations, even if they do not interfere with the right of navigation or with the construction of a dam or other structure to promote the development of water power?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to close debate.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I have asked the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will not interfere.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to interfere now. I just want to know how much time he will devote to this amendment. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WALSH. I was asking the gentleman from Wisconsin a question, and I trust the distinguished chairman will not interrupt the question which I have asked and the pending reply of the gentleman's colleague on the committee.

Mr. SIMS. Let me explain. I am trying to find out how much time was desired on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this debate close in five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SIMS. Then I ask that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have three minutes on this.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it 15 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I make it 12 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois shall have 3. I know he will make good use of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 12 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to repeat the interrogatory for the gentleman from Wisconsin to answer, if he will, whether or not under the provisions of section 18 and section 25, as already amended, the Secretary of Commerce is given authority, in addition to the powers imposed on the other three Cabinet officers who constitute this commission, to prescribe regulation with reference to fishways in navigable streams in States which will supersede the regulations prescribed by the State fish commissions or by the State authorities, even though the regulations prescribed by the State authorities in no way interfere with the construction or location of dams or other structures for the production of water power?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I think it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that Congress has no jurisdiction over fishing rights and so on in the inland navigable waters of the United States, and that that is a subject matter for the State legislatures to supervise. But the purpose of the amendment and of the bill is to give to the Secretary of Commerce at the time that the dam is constructed on these navigable waters the right to say that the licensee should put in a fishway.

Now, if we gave that power to the Secretary of Commerce—and there is no other Federal official to whom it could be given—to be exercised at the time the dam is constructed, when it could be installed more cheaply than it could be at any time thereafter, we would avoid the delay that would necessarily result if we left it for the State officials to authorize, and in many cases it would not be authorized by the State officials, and in some States they have no laws covering the subject matter. I do not think that if the Secretary of Commerce exercised his power he would do it in contravention of or without some conference with the State authorities, and I think all could be amicably arranged. I do not anticipate any of the dangers or difficulties such as the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to suggest by his interrogatory.

Mr. WALSH. We may not always have an amiable and efficient Secretary of Commerce. Suppose we had one that gets into conflicts with the State authorities over this fishway business? Which regulation is going to predominate? The Federal one prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce or the one prescribed by the tSate authority?

Mr. ESCH. I feel that where the Government gives to a licensee the right to construct a dam over a navigable water, it can affix such conditions as to it seems best, and among those conditions would be one to give the Secretary of Commerce the right to say that a fishway should be put in a dam at the time of construction. So on that theory I believe we could justify the provisions of the bill, the putting in of the fishway being one of the conditions which the Government exacts for the issuance of the grant.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and yet the putting in of the fishway has got no more to do with the construction of the dam or the efficient operation of it or the increase of water power than giving them permission to erect the statue of Hendrik Hudson in the middle of the stream; and it seems to me that where you insert an extraneous matter like this and impose additional authority on the Secretary of Commerce you are going to meet with grave conflicts of authority and jurisdiction when this power imposed upon the Secretary of Commerce comes to be exercised.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think anyone who is conversant with the situation will agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin that this amendment is very proper and necessary. When the Keokuk dam was built across the Mississippi River there was no such safety provision as this in the act. The consequence was that when the great structure was completed there was no fishway in it, and there is to-day no fishway through that dam. Fish can not pass back and forth, up and down the Mississippi River. The upper Mississippi River formerly contributed thousands of tons of edible fish to the country. To-day those fish are rapidly disappearing from the upper Mississippi River. The larger fish, such as carp and buffalo and the larger catfish, migrate up and down the river. In the spring of the year people come to the Keokuk dam, and below it they take out tons of fish, where they have come up to the foot of the dam trying to go up the great river. Now, that important food should be conserved, and if this action is not taken the State authorities can not act. They have not sufficient authority, so it is necessary that some central Federal authority be given the right to make regulations relative to this necessary matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question as to why it was thought necessary in line 25, page 51, to insert the words "or with any subpœna"? We have already provided on page 31 that the commission or any member of the commission has a right to issue subpœnas, either an ordinary subpœna or a subpœna duces tecum; and this is added:

And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence.

I was wondering why, in addition to that, it is here provided that if they fail to respond to the subpœna they shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by a fine of $1,000, and so forth.

Mr. SIMS. I do not recall now just what was said about that in the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It strikes me that it is a very unusual thing to subject the licensee to this additional penalty if he fails to respond to a subpœna. I was wondering what is the reason for that.

Mr. SIMS. Do you mean the amount of the penalty, or any penalty?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. He is subpœnaed, and if he fails to respond, you have a right to subject him to any penalty that the court may think proper as for a contempt; and in addition to that, you have this provision here for a fine of a thousand dollars.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall just everything that was said about it when we were dealing with it. This was in both the original and the amended bill. We must remember that very large corporations may be licensees, and I think $1,000 is not an excessive amount. I can not furnish the gentleman any information other than what has already been disclosed. It was thought by the drafters of the bill originally that this penalty should be put in there on account of the very great influence that some of these licensees might have and how little they would care, perhaps, for a smaller penalty.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It occurs to me that the chairman of the committee has certainly guessed the wrong reason.

Mr. SIMS. I may have, as I did not draw the bill and did not put that in it; but unless the gentleman from Mississippi is going to offer an amendment, I wish he would let us proceed and get through.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not intend to offer any amendment. It is not because the corporation is great that they want to provide the penalty, because under the provisions that we have already enacted the licensee is subject to whatever punishment the court may see fit to put on him. That would fit the big corporation. But now you say that the punishment shall be by fine not exceeding $1,000. It is a very curious provision. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIMS. The last word of the present section?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. I do that for the purpose of discussing, if I may, section 24 very briefly. I want to call attention to the last paragraph of that section, which provides—

That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore made for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section contained.

That is an entirely proper provision so far as it goes. The difficulty is, I fear, that the commission or the Secretary of the Interior may assume that it forecloses the right and authority of the Secretary to clear list any lands now reserved and covered with filings, so that a patent without reservation may be made. There is no doubt but what the Secretary now has authority to make these examinations and to recommend to the President the clear listing of any of these lands which he finds have been erroneously or unnecessarily reserved. But at this time the Land Office are taking no action in these matters, they say, pending the passage of the act.

If the act passes in this form, I trust that the Secretary will feel that he is foreclosed so far as the land actually covered with these filings are concerned and that under the law he can only do one thing, and that is to issue them a limited patent, and a very limited patent it is under this act.

I shall not ask to return to the section for the purpose of offering an amendment now, but suggest an amendment in case, as the consideration of the bill progresses, it may develop that the Interior Department officials have any doubt of their authority to clear list lands after the bill becomes a law. The amendment might provide that the commission shall, as soon as practicable after the passage of the act, cause an examination to be made of lands that have been heretofore withdrawn for power sites and recommend to the Secretary of the Interior the restoration of such lands as in their opinion are not necessary for power-site purposes.

I think everyone familiar with the situation in the Western States knows that the power-site withdrawals were hurriedly made and that considerable areas were included that were not needed and never will be needed for power-site purposes. Some have been covered with filings; such lands should be clear listed, because the provisions of this act should no longer apply to land not actually needed for power-site purposes.

It is altogether possible that the department will hold in any event, without regard to the proviso, they have full authority to recommend the clear listing and withdrawal from classification of lands not needed for these purposes. If so, well and good. If there should be any doubt in regard to that when the bill is in conference, then some slight modification should be made to make it clear that the lands that have been withdrawn which are found after examination not needed for power development may be restored, the withdrawal revoked, so the entryman may proceed to secure his patent in fee without limitation.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; but no such alteration, amendment, or repeal shall affect any license theretofore issued under the provisions of this act, or the rights of any licensee thereunder.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of section 28 all of line 25, page 53, after the word "reserved," and all of lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 54.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning on page 53, line 25, after the word "reserve," strike out the following language: "but no such alteration, amendment, or repeal shall affect any license theretofore issued under the provisions of this act, or the rights of any licensee thereunder."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to modify or repeal any of the provisions of the act of Congress approved December 19, 1913, granting certain rights of way to the city and county of San Francisco.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to section 26 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to lose my right to offer an amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I shall object to returning to the section.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. We ought to go back and adopt an amendment, so that it will be in harmony with the amendment that was offered to section 25.

Mr. SIMS. I shall object to returning to the section.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I offer my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 9, after the word "San Francisco," insert:

"Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the waters of the Niagara River, Niagara Falls, or to any other boundary waters which are the subject of treaty between the United States and a foreign country."

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that this amendment was offered heretofore, fully discussed, and that an adverse vote was had upon it, and I call attention to page 9768 of the RECORD.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it was my impression the other day, when I came into the House and the matter was being discussed, that the gentleman from Tennessee asked that it be passed over and be considered after the bill had been read. The amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] was pending, and it was suggested that any other amendment might be offered at that time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that the gentleman from Tennessee did make such an agreement, but I say that that is in conflict with the fact that the matter had been debated and voted upon. This amendment was offered heretofore and voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman read that amendment and give the citation in the RECORD?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It is on page 9768, at the top of second column. The amendment was to insert "except boundary streams." And this amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi is simply an enumeration of certain boundary streams which are excluded by the term "boundary streams" in general. It is the same amendment in effect. It would not change the effect of this amendment at all if you struck out the words that precede "boundary streams." The effect would remain exactly the same.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the amendment the gentleman calls attention to applied only to a certain section of the bill and was very limited in its scope. This amendment I offer applies to every provision and section of the bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The amendment, if adopted, offered at the point where it was, would have excluded boundary streams from the effect of this act and every part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a further point of order, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is not germane to this paragraph. Is it offered as a new section?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. It is offered as a proviso to that particular section.

Mr. ANDERSON. The section to which this is offered as a proviso makes a specific exception. The gentleman from Mississippi seeks to add to that another specific exception. The rule is well settled, I think, that where a bill or section deals with a specific matter, it is not in order to attach to that section another specific proposition of the same nature. For instance, where you have a bill authorizing the construction of a post-office building at a certain place, it is not in order to offer an amendment authorizing the construction of the building in some other place. What the gentleman seeks to do here is to attach one specific exception to another specific exception to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I submit this amendment that I offer is by way of a limitation upon the whole bill and this is the proper part of the bill to place it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the gentleman's argument, it is that we can vote a second time upon this because the amendment as offered in the first instance applied only to certain specified provisions in the bill and not to the whole of it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. If the gentleman wants my opinion, I do not think there is a thing in his contention. I did think there might be something in the contention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. The amendment that was voted on to which the gentleman calls the attention of the House is quite different from the one that I offered here.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not think it is at all.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That amendment pertained to a certain section of the bill. This pertains to every provision in the bill and is broader in its scope than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not care to be heard unless the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. If the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, I would like to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to say; but if the gentleman desires to be heard, he will hear him briefly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the point of order should be overruled from both standpoints. First, it is not the same amendment that was offered before and voted upon. That distinctly referred exclusively to boundary streams. This specifies, it is true, Niagara Falls, but it limits boundary streams to those that are the subject of treaties with a foreign power, and that differentiates it clearly and distinctly. There can be no question about that.

As to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], if it is germane anywhere, its proper place is exactly where it is offered. It relates to the bill and all the paragraphs of the bill. This is a bill dealing with water power, prescribing the conditions under which water powers can be developed throughout the country. There are many sections which contain a part of the general plan. Here is a limitation upon the general plan and upon the details of that plan contained in the various sections. It should, therefore, with propriety be offered at the end, where it has been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is materially different from the one voted on a day or two ago, and therefore overrules the point of order.

As to the location of the proviso, the Chair thinks it may be offered either as a proviso or as a separate section of the bill. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment in order to clear up a situation that might exist here. Some think that the provisions of this bill, which was drafted and is proposed to be passed for the purpose of developing water power upon the public lands of the country and in the navigable streams of the United States, might affect the development of water power at Niagara Falls. It is in order to clear up that idea that we propose this amendment. Clearly the committee had no thought of embracing the Niagara Falls development in the general provisions of this bill. It was never suggested to the House, it was never suggested to the committee that reported the rule to create this committee, that they should ever give consideration to the development of water power at Niagara Falls or deal with that question at all. On the contrary, the letter that the President wrote to Congress, to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, was to ask us to get together and form a new committee that might legislate touching the building of dams and the development of water power in the public domain and on the navigable streams of the United States.

And in passing the rule creating the committee this provision was inserted in the rule that took away from this special committee the jurisdiction over any boundary stream. I want to read it to the committee:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a special committee of 18 Members, to whom all bills and resolutions hereafter introduced during the Sixty-fifth Congress pertaining to the development and utilization of water power shall be referred, except, however, bills and resolutions of which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has jurisdiction under the general rules of the House.

Now, that was incorporated in there, and the gentleman from Kansas recalls quite distinctly why it was put in there. I called the attention of the Committee on Rules to the fact that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had jurisdiction of this Niagara Falls proposition; it was complicated; that they had given much attention and tedious consideration to that question; and that they were about ready to report a bill, and the special committee ought not to obtain jurisdiction of this question. All agreed to that. The select Committee on Water Power so understood the matter, and it really did not come to the attention of that committee until the other day, and then they did not know for sure whether or not it embraced Niagara Falls. It is really to remove all ambiguity or any doubt about the question that I have offered this amendment. Now, some one may say, What is the difference in the provisions of this bill and those that pertain to Niagara Falls? There are many. In the development of hydroelectric power at Niagara Falls whatever rights we have are under a treaty with Canada. That gave us the right to develop 20,000 cubic feet per second. Canada has the right to divert 36,000 cubic feet per second. The question of the scenic beauty of the Falls, the question of affecting established power companies that have been in operation for a long time are there, and which, I might say, have robbed the people for a number of years in extortionate and unreasonable charges.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any possibility of the Committee on Foreign Affairs reporting a bill that will have in contemplation the development of additional water power at Niagara Falls so it can be utilized in the conduct of the war?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has passed through this House on two separate occasions general legislation touching water-power development at Niagara. We passed a bill last Congress. We are ready now to report a bill which I think will meet all these questions and solve them justly and fairly in the public interest. The committee has given very careful consideration to this question, because we realize the situation up there, and every other Member of this House must, that legislation ought to be passed, and passed speedily, that will provide additional power and at the same time protect the rights of the public.

Mr. MADDEN. The question I asked the gentleman from Mississippi is whether the legislation they propose to report will authorize additional development of water power?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Absolutely, under our treaty. We can not authorize over 20,000 cubic feet per second, but that we propose to do and to go to the limit; so I submit, with these treaty rights involved, with the scenic beauty involved, with the established power companies, that ought to be compelled to remodel the plants so that the highest efficiency might be reached and we might get some benefits from the diversion of the water there, ought to be considered in this matter. These questions have not been considered by the committee having this matter in charge, and if we should pass this bill under the circumstances and let the provisions of this bill apply to Niagara Falls it does seem to me it would be very unwise. Does the gentleman from New York desire to ask a question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I simply want to ask the gentleman this: How many hearings have there been since the Secretary of War sent this bill to the committee in May?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I have been on this committee eight years——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Since May.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I do not know of other hearings, but the gentleman's clients up there were all heard. We have given ample time to everybody——

Mr. DEMPSEY. I have not any clients; I am not representing a power company.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I take that statement back. I meant the gentleman's constituents. Of course, I did not mean that at all. Everybody has been invited and we have given them all the time that was desired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to see if we can get an agreement in regard to debate on this amendment. I am not going to make a motion, but I want to get an agreement as to the length of debate on this amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think I ought to have 20 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. How much time will the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs desire to use in support of your amendment?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I did not think there was any opposition to it. If there is opposition, of course, we want to be heard.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from New York has asked for 20 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not know who else——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I desire to have five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin is on the Foreign Affairs Committee?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] want to be heard.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I want five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will see if this will accommodate the gentleman and all of them. I ask that debate on this amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi and all amendments thereto close in one hour, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in support of the amendment and whoever the gentlemen on the other side may select——

Mr. ESCH. Mr. DEMPSEY.

Mr. SIMS. And one-half the time be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Out of that I would like to have five minutes, because this amendment as it is worded includes the Colorado River and affects all our irrigation there.

Mr. SIMS. Let us not discuss the merits; I am trying to get an agreement.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will allow me to have five minutes of that time.

Mr. SIMS. Which side is the gentleman on?

Mr. RAKER. I am against the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from New York yield me five minutes?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that on this amendment and any amendment thereto that all debate be closed in one hour, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the other half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY]. Is there objection?

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if this includes the Colorado River I want 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. KETTNER. Can I have any time on this?

Mr. SIMS. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. KETTNER. I am.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman should consult the gentleman over there.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I can not give you over five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. We can agree on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I object to the unanimous-consent agreement, unless we can have further time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] objects to the request made for unanimous consent.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. The chairman stated that the time had been allotted.

Mr. WINGO. The Chair asked if there was objection, and I rose and objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas claims that he was asking recognition when the Chair made his statement.

Mr. WINGO. There was much confusion here, with half a dozen gentlemen talking about different things.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the request be again submitted.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Can not the gentleman revise his request so as to accommodate the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]?

Mr. WINGO. There were at least 40 or 45 minutes asked for against the amendment, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] was allowed only 30 minutes, which will necessitate an extension of time. I think it will expedite matters to find out how many want time now and cover all of it.

Mr. SIMS. I asked for an hour. Those who want time in favor of it could get it from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and those against it could get it from the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's request covered in all 30 minutes for the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] when there were gentlemen asking for 45 minutes against it.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from New York was satisfied why is not the gentleman from Arkansas satisfied?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not control my emotions.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I want to yield the gentleman from Arkansas some time.

Mr. SIMS. Then yield it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request preferred by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]?

Mr. WINGO. I object, unless a reasonable time is allowed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in one hour.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee, who has wasted so much time, insists on that, I will make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. WINGO. I am glad there is something not debatable that the gentleman has in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. WINGO. I certainly insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members are present, a quorum. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in one hour.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 7.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GILLETT. I make the point of order that that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that as the Chair counted a quorum but a minute ago, the motion is dilatory.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a unanimous-consent request that one-half of this time be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. WINGO. I object, after the gentleman has consumed as much time as he and his colleagues have, to his shutting out anybody that wants to be heard. I shall object to any unanimous consents for the rest of the day.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct attention to some facts disclosed in the RECORD. On the 29th of June last, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], secured unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 158, to extend the provisions of the Burton Act to July 1, 1919. That resolution provided for the diversion of 20,000 cubic feet of water per second at Niagara Falls. During that debate the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] moved the following amendment to the bill:

> Unless the Congress shall before that date enact legislation regulating and controlling the diversions of water from the Niagara River, or from boundary streams generally, in which event this resolution shall cease to be of any further force or effect.

I read from the RECORD:

> Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that the words "or from boundary streams generally" ought to be omitted. I do not think we want the waters of the cataract of Niagara in any way taken away from the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, acting in pursuance of a treaty with a foreign country.
> Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman that in the formation of the Water-Power Committee and the rule that provided for it there was taken from it jurisdiction—or there never was given to it jurisdiction—of the waters of the Niagara River and other boundary streams, so that the Niagara River and other boundary streams are left to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Thereupon my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD] amended his amendment, as I had suggested, by striking out the words "or other boundary streams," and so on. It thus appears that it was the understanding of the House on the 29th of June that jurisdiction over the diversion of the waters of the Niagara River was exclusively in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as it ought to be, because of the fact that the amount of water which may be diverted there is fixed by a treaty between this country and Great Britain. The House took a recess only two weeks later. Members left this Chamber on that day, June 29, and went to their respective districts on the 15th of July supposing that the special committee which has in its charge the bill now before the House would not assume jurisdiction over the waters of the Niagara River. Nobody thought anything to the contrary. I went to Wisconsin and did not know until I received word from here that a provision to cover Niagara River had been incorporated in this bill.

This vastly important legislation is important enough without inserting in it something that never belonged rightfully to the committee which reported this bill. The pending measure is one of the most supremely important of all the bills relating to civil affairs which have been considered by Congress during the last half century, and yet we have only half a House here. Consideration of the bill was delayed until the hottest weather of the summer, when half of the House had gone home for the campaign, and then there was lugged into the bill something which, according to the distinct understanding on the 29th of June, should not be in it. And so we should adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]—soon, by the way, to be a Senator from that State—and retain in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, where, under the rules of the House, it properly belongs, jurisdiction over the diversion of the water at Niagara Falls under the treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-nine gentlemen of the committee are present, and, counting myself, makes 100—a quorum.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to controvert——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, may I make a parliamentary inquiry, whether this time is controlled by anyone except the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I understood I had 20 minutes of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection was made to the unanimous-consent request. The Chair will divide the time between those who favor and those who oppose it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that mean that 10 minutes will be controlled by the other side also?

Mr. GILLETT. No.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It would simply mean that two gentlemen would be recognized on the opposite side for Mr. DEMPSEY. I think that is fair. The gentleman is interested in this matter beyond any other Member.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to controvert at all the point made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. I am willing to admit that there is a question of jurisdiction involved here, and I want to go further and to say that, under the rule as reported, the Foreign Affairs Committee has jurisdiction. I am going to say, though, that, with that conceded state of facts, this House ought to include Niagara in this bill, and I am going to say why.

Last spring the Secretary of War made a survey of the industries at Niagara Falls with reference to their use for war purposes, and he discovered that there was a shortage of 135,000 horsepower. He estimated that there would be a shortage for war purposes by the 1st day of January, 1919, of 200,000 horsepower. All of the industry and all of the power at Niagara Falls is used for war purposes. They make all the electrical products that go into war munitions. They make all the abrasives, for instance, that are used in aeroplanes. They make all the ferrosilicon, without which 70 per cent of the steel that we have could not be made at all.

The Secretary of War, finding that situation—finding that the power at Niagara Falls was absolutely essential for the conduct of the war—sent a special message to the Committee on Foreign Affairs urging that committee to pass a bill. He sent that in May last. Two such messages have been sent, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs has not acted. I do not believe that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has even concluded its hearings. I understand that they have not printed their last hearing, much less have they reached the point where they are ready to go into executive session and consider any bill. They are far from reaching the point where they are able to say to this House that they can ever agree upon a bill.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Is it not true that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had hearings practically up to the recess of Congress, when everybody went home?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It is a fact that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had a few hearings, very sparsely attended. I do not think at any given time there were over 4 members out of the 21 present. I was present at all the hearings. The gentleman from Mississippi was present at parts of two hearings. I am not criticizing him. We are all glad that the gentleman had something else to do. We all love him and admire him, and we are glad that he is to be promoted. But I do say this, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs was unable to recognize the seriousness of the situation which confronted them. It was unable to attend the hearings in adequate numbers. It was unable to have enough hearings. It was unable to conclude its hearings. It was unable to reach any conclusion, and it has not yet reached the point where it is even ready to undertake to debate the question whether or not——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not yield yet. It has not yet reached the point where it has been able to debate and to ascertain whether or not it is ever likely to agree upon a bill.

Now, let us see what the situation is.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman says that I was not at the meetings.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No. I said you were at two meetings.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman realizes, however, that we have had this same question up and have considered it for six years.

Mr. DEMPSEY. For seven or eight years.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I went with the committee to Niagara Falls and Buffalo, and we personally looked into the matter there.

Mr. DEMPSEY. You did not have war then, and did not have a message from the Secretary of War saying that he needed these munitions for the use of the boys at the front, and not a man on the committee has awakened to the fact that you received that message. You have not responded to it. You are not at all alive to the situation. You think that it is the same as it was in the six or seven or eight years past, and you think it will do no harm to wait six or seven or eight years more in the future because you have waited six or seven or eight years in the past. That is the situation that confronts us. Now let us take the needs of the country into consideration.

The Secretary of War, realizing that there was this shortage of power, realizing the necessity of obtaining additional power, sent for the power companies there and asked them what could be done. He had an investigation made by the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and I call attention to the report of the Chief of Engineers. It was made in April and was presented to the Foreign Affairs Committee. In that report the Chief of Engineers said that if the work at Niagara Falls was undertaken at once it would result in there being produced 30,000 additional horsepower within 12 months, and 170,000 horsepower in consecutive periods of three months after that. The first additional horsepower would be produced in May, 1919, and units of 30,000 horsepower each three months thereafter. The War Office needs that 60,000 additional horsepower on which they have figured for next spring. They have actually made an order alloting it, and besides that they went to the power companies at Niagara Falls and said to them, "Gentlemen, we have not been able as yet to get legislation, but we believe that we will get legislation, and we want you to go ahead with increasing your power there, and spend your money and take the risk as patriotic citizens." The power companies responding have expended $800,000 of their money and are to-day proceeding as rapidly as they can; and according to the program laid down by the Secretary of War they will produce the power within the time named, and so aid in the carrying on of this war.

Mr. HASTINGS. How much additional money does the gentleman say has been expended?

Mr. DEMPSEY. They have expended $800,000, without any license, without anything except the request on the part of the Secretary of War that they expend it, and that they take the risk; and the power company which is doing that work has reached the end of its ability to expend. It is selling its bonds, but this is a difficult time to sell bonds in competition with liberty bonds. It finds it impossible to raise money, because it has no license, and this work must stop. So, realizing that situation and seeing that this bill was broad enough in its terms to include Niagara, I wrote the Secretary of War Sunday asking him whether Niagara should remain in the bill. He wrote back to me a letter, which you will find at page 10751 of the RECORD, in which he said that it would be so great a mistake that it would be almost a disaster for the work up there to stop, and that the work would cease unless we were able to pass a bill and unless it was included in this bill so that it could go into effect and become a law at once.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Can this additional power which the gentleman refers to be developed under the provisions of the bill as reported from the committee without in any way violating any of our treaty rights with Canada?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It can, and I answer the gentleman to that effect, and I would like the close attention of the House upon this question.

The treaty with Great Britain is an executed treaty. Under its terms Canada has the right to divert 36,000 cubic feet per second and the United States has the right to divert 20,000 cubic feet per second. Canada and Great Britain have not the slightest interest in any way in what we divert. That is purely and wholly a domestic, an internal question. So that there is not the slightest reason, as the Secretary of War points out, why we should not go on and treat this particular diversion exactly as we treat all other diversions. Niagara is not here asking special privileges. Niagara is here, having proved patriotic, having spent nearly $1,000,000 of its own money, asking the right to go on in the same way that other power companies and other power sites are permitted to go on, under the same restrictions and under the same conditions, subject to the same law, with no additional privileges of any kind whatever, and asking that right to go on in order that the boys at the front may be supplied with gas, because all our gas is made up there, and so that we may supply them with munitions of war of all kinds.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is there any shortage now in this country of these essential war materials which are exclusively produced by the power at Niagara Falls?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask unanimous consent to continue for two minutes, to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will answer that the Secretary of War in his letter says that there is a shortage of such supplies, and that there will be a shortage of such supplies unless we are able to pass a bill which will enable the power there to be made thoroughly efficient. Now, gentlemen, the question is simply this: I would be glad to see the Foreign Affairs Committee have jurisdiction of anything of which it properly has jurisdiction. I have respect for all the members of that committee; but the question is, Which is the more important? Is it more important to produce 170,000 additional horsepower—and really more than that, because we will continue the operation during the war of the old plant—or is it more important that the jurisdiction of this committee should be recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised at some of the statements that have been made by the gentleman who has just preceded me, in view of the fact that the Committee on Foreign Affairs some time ago reported a resolution which passed the House and the Senate, and is now in effect, which permits the power companies at Niagara Falls to use all of the 20,000 cubic feet of water available under the treaty. Nothing is being held up.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman know enough of the situation to know that that does not go at all to the question of Niagara's efficiency, that it develops at the low efficiency which prevails now, and that the two questions are as far apart as the poles? Or do the gentlemen of the Foreign Affairs Committee indulge in a very erroneous impression?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will answer that question. The whole of the water available is in use, and is being used now by the companies that are in control. Long before a plant could be built farther down the stream that would get more fall, and consequently develop more power with the same water, the bill that is under contemplation, on which hearings have been had, will be reported out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The provisions of that bill will be, it seems to me, much more in harmony with the treaty that has been negotiated and is now in force than a general bill covering the whole country.

There is a good reason why the treaty which applies to the waters of Niagara River ought not to be applied to streams elsewhere in the United States. If this bill does conform in its provisions to all the requirements of the treaty, it is going to interfere with the development of streams not bound by that treaty. My own impression of the bill, from a somewhat careful reading, is that the treaty was not taken into consideration at all by the committee that reported the bill. The legislation concerning the development of Niagara should be prepared with a view to the treaty.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman can not take me off my feet.

Mr. WINGO. I can make the point of no quorum at any time, and I insist on the point; there are only 57 Members in the Hall.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes more. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members present, a quorum, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I had about concluded what I wanted to say. The waters of Niagara River are subject to treaty and the interior waters of the country are not. Legislation providing for the use of interior waters ought not to be bound by the restrictions of that treaty, and this bill does not take into consideration the restrictions of the treaty. But the waters of Niagara are bound, and we are bound in dealing with the waters by the treaty in force. I submit to the Members of this House that this is no time for us to make laws that if applied to the development of water power at Niagara might affect matters dealt with in our treaty. Treaty rights ought to be respected. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be recognized in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California was to be recognized next.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi is going to ask unanimous consent to present a modified amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I expect to do so.

Mr. RAKER. With that understanding, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to use any time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the deep interest my good friend from New York, Mr. DEMPSEY, feels in this matter. However, I can not share with him the view he takes of the effect of this amendment. It has always been recognized by Congress that Niagara Falls constituted a water power that should receive separate and distinct treatment for certain technical reasons. Some things under that treaty we can do, and there are many things we can not do in respect to the Falls of Niagara and the waters of Niagara River, and yet all these things we can do in respect to streams of the entire United States. That view was in the minds of this House when the special committee was appointed to take up water-power legislation. The rule was framed with that in view.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. Is there anything as a matter of fact in the provisions of this act which would interfere or conflict in any way with our treaty with Canada?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not sure that it would interfere or conflict with the treaty with Canada unless we undertook to do some things which might be undertaken, and if I have time I will state what I mean by that. When the special committee was considering this bill I am advised they were distinctly informed—and I wish to be corrected by the gentleman from Tennessee if I am not right—the committee was distinctly informed that they had no jurisdiction over Niagara Falls or the water power there, and for that reason they naturally and properly declined to give any consideration to the special conditions affecting the water power at that place.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that my information was that the language used in the special rule excluded consideration of all bills of which the Foreign Affairs Committee had jurisdiction; that we were excluded from considering the boundary waters, and especially Niagara. When gentlemen came before the committee, witnesses, and began to make statements concerning it, I said every time, that I understood from the rule, from my construction of it, that the special Water Power Committee had no jurisdiction of any question arising with reference to legislation touching boundary waters, because I understood boundary waters were all of them more or less affected by general or special treaty stipulations of which the Committee on Foreign Affairs had special jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his frank and complete statement. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], if I understand his viewpoint correctly, has just one reason why he wants Niagara Falls included within the purview of this bill, and that is to get speedy action for the further development of the Falls. But if the gentleman will give a moment's calm thought to the parliamentary and practical situation, I do not believe he will retain that for very long. We have been trying in Congress for four years to pass a general water-power bill, and we have not yet done it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? How long have we been trying to pass a bill for Niagara Falls?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The same length of time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; twice as long.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That may be, but we have passed it twice in the House.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And we have passed the general water bill twice in the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We have been trying for four years to pass a general bill and have not yet done it. When this bill is passed it will go to conference, and it certainly will never be reported from the conference before the new year, and I doubt that the conference report will be adopted in many, many months of time, so that the gentleman will not gain at all any time by having Niagara Falls included in the bill, and as a matter of fact the situation there is not quite so bad as it has been painted. In the first place, our committee has reported a resolution, which has passed and is now a law, authorizing the full development of all of the 20,000 cubic feet that we can develop upon our side of Niagara Falls. The gentleman from New York a moment ago called attention to the fact that that resolution did not provide for the complete efficiency in the development, and in that he is correct; but I want to call his attention to the fact that there is nothing in this bill either which makes those power companies develop those 20,000 cubic feet to their full efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I have three minutes more? I do not believe many gentlemen care to discuss this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has promised 30 minutes, including 5 the gentleman has used, to gentlemen in favor of the amendment. However, if no one desires to use more time in opposition to the amendment, the Chair will put the gentleman's request.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, all I ask is that we be given our full half hour.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman from New York had additional time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not object to your having the full half hour.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object to the three minutes extension, but was not the time fixed by motion of the House at one hour?

The CHAIRMAN. That is very true.

Mr. HASTINGS. Are the three minutes to be taken out of the other side?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We gave additional time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But I expect that that will be taken out of our half hour.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, I would understand that the three minutes should be taken out of the half hour of those in favor of the amendment.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is there any half hour assigned to that side or this side? There was just a motion that the time be limited to one hour.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the time is not to be extended any longer than the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Notwithstanding the fact that by motion we provided that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto should close in one hour, that does not abrogate the general rule limiting debate to 10 minutes on each particular amendment that is offered. I make the point of order that all debate upon this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the motion was made that debate upon this amendment was to close in one hour.

Mr. WINGO. This amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, it is easy to get around that. The gentleman can move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. He has asked unanimous consent, and there is no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not yet been put. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I object. There is a parliamentary inquiry pending.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order that the gentleman can not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for three minutes, inasmuch as it is allotted to the Chair to divide the time among the members of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Chair can not do that without unanimous consent, and that was objected to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can recognize any member of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. But, Mr. Chairman, the Chair certainly does not wish to set a precedent that the Chair can arbitrarily extend the time of any Member when the committee objects to it. I do not object to the chairman's count, but I do object to any such rule as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman no doubt does not object to the Chairman's count because it has been correct.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I submit that debate has been fixed at one hour, and in that hour I assume the Chairman can recognize anyone he sees fit.

Mr. WINGO. Does the Chair rule that he can be heard for three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if he has the power.

Mr. WINGO. Did the Chair overrule my point of order that the Chair can not arbitrarily recognize a man for any amount of time he desires after objection is made to a request for unanimous consent that his time be extended?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion, where the committee passes an order that an hour of debate shall be used on a certain amendment and all amendments thereto, leaving it to the Chair to designate whom he shall recognize, that he possibly would have the right to recognize the gentleman from Minnesota for five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Or for the whole hour? That is a new ruling. There never has been anything like that suggested in this or any other intelligent legislative body.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to divide the time equally among the Members, 5 minutes at a time, 30 minutes of debate against and 30 minutes for the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. But that right was not granted. I objected to such unanimous-consent request.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Under the rules of the House we are operating under the five-minute rule. No decision of the Chair can abrogate the rules of the House. The committee has not undertaken to abrogate the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee fixed the time.

Mr. WINGO. The committee limited the time of debate under the rules of the House. The committee certainly can not abrogate the rules of the House.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the regular order. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for three additional minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in further reference to the proposition of time, I wish to call the attention of the House to this important fact I deem material. Our hearings developed the fact that these power companies are not waiting for the passage of this general law or any other law, but ever since the beginning of March have been developing to the fullest extent of their power the water power at Niagara Falls in violation of the law, believing a law will some time be passed to legalize that which they have done. There is nobody controverting that well-established fact. The power companies at Niagara Falls at this minute are developing with all the speed that money and men can bring the power to the full capacity of those falls, and it matters not whether this or any other amendment shall be adopted they are going to continue that work, and they are doing it knowing that the Government will, no doubt, in the end legalize that which they are doing. It could not be possible to bring full relief. The gentleman has rightly stated that we want 170,000 horsepower, with one hundred and twenty-odd thousand now, but if wishes were horses how fast we would ride. You can not produce that power by the passage of this bill or any other bill affecting Niagara Falls. It takes time to secure that which the gentleman asks for and that which we would like to see, and it will take not 10 months but four years, and every man knows it; but now for the immediate present they are developing the power there with all the speed that they can to furnish power for these munition plants. The Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, I think, have been exceedingly earnest in their serious investigation of this particular and peculiar proposition. Do not ever let it pass from your minds that we must, before we have finished with Niagara Falls, compel one of the power companies that is there to change its plant, and change it so that it will have an increased efficiency, much greater than it now has.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is in the minds of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If I had the time, but I have not.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, to endeavor to put this general dam bill on the Niagara situation is like trying to fit a hand-me-down coat on a man with a hump on his back. This bill is designed to fit a certain situation. It has general application. It is intended to promote development, to apply to cases remote from industrial centers where there are no works at this time, where new works will be installed, and where a great outlay will be necessary in order to harness the water. It does not fit Niagara. The works are already there. The great bulk of the money has already been expended. It is close to great industrial centers, so that the demand for power is there. Niagara affords the cheapest power in the United States; no inducements need be offered to concerns to locate there. It is an entirely different situation from what a dam site would be out somewhere in the Rocky Mountains or over on the Columbia River or some other place to which this general dam act is designed to apply.

Now, another point. We have at Niagara to deal with a treaty situation. Perhaps the Committee on Foreign Affairs does not know all about such situations; but at least it seems to me that its members ought to be assumed to know more than somebody who knows nothing at all. For years they have been studying this Niagara situation. For years they have been holding hearings and trying to work out a solution consistent with the public interest. We have reported two bills. We have got a bill very similar to this one before us now being considered. We have held hearings day after day and have had come before us the highest experts in the land, people who know all about the Niagara situation and who have told us all they know, whereas the Special Water Power Committee has held no hearings on the Niagara situation, has not considered it for a moment, does not know whether this bill fits that situation or not, and necessarily could not have the understanding and the knowledge of the situation that we have. Now, the Committee on Foreign Affairs have studied this situation, and it seems to me that the public welfare requires that we should consider some bill that comes from that committee in order to get a fit and suitable bill.

Now, there is another point connected with Niagara. The State of New York claims certain rights in the Niagara water power, and under charters from the State of New York certain concerns have been there for years availing themselves of these waters, and they have taken for their own use, for their own selfish benefit and profit, all of the benefit derived from water power at Niagara.

These corporations claim to have vested rights. They have their works there and their dams, and they have spent a lot of money. They say that the Federal Government has no right to come in there and deal with the situation as a new situation. This general dam bill deals with all situations as new situations. Therefore it is necessarily inapplicable to the situation at Niagara.

Speaking for myself as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I would be glad to see that committee relieved of the consideration of this question forever. We have labored long on it. We have sweated a lot trying to work out that proposition, and I am satisfied that no bill will ever be reported by that committee that will meet my full approval, and I doubt very much if any bill will come out of it that I can vote for at all.

The whole truth about the situation is that the concerns at Niagara, being in possession of the water and drawing the entire benefit from it, have been themselves an obstacle to legislation by Congress. They themselves held back the arm of Congress and kept it from writing a law that would protect the rights of the American people. They, more than anybody else, are responsible for the delay. And it is only now, when this war is on, when they can make the excuse of war necessity, that these selfish concerns seek to step in and get for the next 50 years the benefit of Niagara which they have already enjoyed for so long. For the next 50 years they expect to enjoy the monopoly of Niagara as they have in the past. For the next 50 years they expect to sweat the people of Buffalo and of the whole country under these rights they now seek under the guise of a war necessity. They have contracts with our Government which are exceedingly unfair and oppressive. They have gotten them because they were in a situation to demand them. And I, for one, would rather suffer some of the things we need now than to perpetuate at Niagara these grasping and avaricious concerns that have wrung the blood out of the people during all these years.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I have consulted with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], and the gentleman from Arkansas is willing to withdraw his objection to the time being divided as was originally suggested between Mr. HARRISON for the amendment and myself against the amendment.

Here is the difficulty, if the Chair pleases, that I think we are going to meet: The Committee on Foreign Affairs is here, and they will speak individually as to this matter. I am practically single-handed. I represent this district, and I will have to speak longer than the five minutes allowed under the rule as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. What time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining part of the 30 minutes on my side be at my disposal, either for myself or such gentlemen as I wish to have recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What time remains now for either side?

Mr. DEMPSEY. How much time have we of the 30 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes have been devoted to the debate by those in favor of the amendment and 12 minutes have been used by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] wishes to be recognized against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] for five minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to say only a word.

This is a practical question. Of course, Niagara is governed by treaty. Of course, if we pass the bill as it is, it will not touch the water powers that are there now or change the present treaty, but if we have any new treaty, say, during the recess of Congress there ought to be somebody that could take care of the matter. And I really think everybody in this House, as a practical matter, would say that we should not have two commissions to regulate water powers throughout the United States. The questions are the same. The questions of rates, of accounting, of the managing of the net investment—all the questions at Niagara—will be just the same, because the United States wants to take a great deal more water and to get a great deal more fall, whether they get more or not, and to see that the best thing is done.

I do not know anything about the technicalities of this matter, but I do regret very much that the Committee on Foreign Affairs should insist that if a new treaty is made it should wait upon their being able to pass a new bill, which is very questionable, and which would provoke a great deal of debate. The practical way to dispose of this matter is to say nothing about Niagara, but give the whole practical management of water power to the commission now created by this bill, for this bill is going through. And when that is done the question as to how much jurisdiction shall be given under new treaties will belong to the President, where it now belongs, and to the new treaties when ratified by the Senate. This is the practical way of disposing of the whole matter. If the Committee on Foreign Affairs want to change this, let them pass a bill. They can do it afterwards as well as before this bill passes.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take 10 minutes, so do not be discouraged by the Chair's allowing me that much time. I wish simply to answer what has been advanced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who seems to be the only gentleman who has spoken to anything except jurisdiction and who has spoken very fairly and very considerately and for whose manner of presenting the subject I have nothing but praise. But I want to answer his argument and say something about the argument advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] also. Both of them said that by passing the special resolution which we have passed here from year to year we have provided for full development. They did not mean that. If they had been speaking thoughtfully and had analyzed what they said they would not have made that statement.

All that that means is that the power company, with their present methods of development, with an efficiency on the part of the Niagara Falls Power Co. of only 10 horsepower per cubic foot per second, has the right to use this power. What we insist upon is a new development by which we will develop 21 horsepower per cubic foot per second—more than twice as much.

Now, they can use it for 10 horsepower per cubic foot per second with their present equipment, with their present inefficient methods, but in order to get 21 horsepower per cubic foot per second they will have to spend $16,000,000. That is the difference. They will have to make an enormous change, a total change, of the method of using the power. One company develops part of its power efficiently—only a part of it—while the other gets only less than half efficiency.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield very gladly.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not possible that the present water-power organizations at Niagara may be very anxious to get the application of this bill, which will give them a 50-year charter, while a fuller study and a bill for Niagara alone can be hedged about by many conditions that are not in this bill?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question, because it brings to my mind something that I ought to have said, and I am glad to say it now. The gentleman charged by this administration with water-power questions, Mr. Bulkley, was in my office this morning, and he stated that the Niagara companies had said this to him—this provides for a term not to exceed 50 years—he said that the Niagara companies said to him, "We are willing to take such a term as you deem to be a fit and proper term, and upon which we can raise money. We are willing to pay such royalties as you deem fit and proper. We are willing to take it subject to such limitations and conditions as you deem adequate and proper." He said, "I believe that these companies which have been attacked and which in the face of attack have spent nearly a million dollars, without any security for its return, should have this said in their behalf, because it is only fair that it should be said, and it is only fair that Congress should have an adequate idea of their patriotism and loyalty in this matter."

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I do not believe that there is a Member of this Congress that thinks that Congress would not recompense any expense that these companies should go to in preparing for war, but I will say to the gentleman that my greatest objection to this bill is this 50-year license. I do not like a license as long as that.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It is not 50 years. It is not to exceed 50 years. Let me say to the gentleman that these companies have said to the Secretary of War something that is unique. I call the attention of the Members of this House to the fact that they have said something that is unique in the history of this war. Every man who has built a manufacturing plant, every man who has undertaken new work of any kind, has asked the Government to reimburse him for the added cost, because of the fact that it is an increased expense to do these things under war conditions. But the people at Niagara have not asked for any such conditions.

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] said that the power companies are going on and that they will go on. The gentleman is simply mistaken in his facts. The facts are these: The power companies have had five dredges up there and they have pulled off three. For what reason? Because they have been unable to sell their bonds; because the company doing this work has exhausted its cash. It is unable to sell its bonds because it has not a license, and the work will stop.

Now, the gentleman from Minnesota also says that this general water-power bill does not provide for efficiency. The gentleman has not graced us by his presence during the consideration of the bill, and he simply is not familiar with the provisions of the bill. The bill, of course, provides for efficiency. No general water-power bill would for one moment be passed or even considered by this House which did not provide for efficiency. The gentleman simply is not familiar with the provisions of the bill under consideration. It provides fully, of course, for efficiency. Do you believe that the great House of Representatives would pass a general water-power bill and not provide for efficiency, and would provide for efficiency in one dealing with one water power alone? Such a thought is unthinkable. It is unbelievable, and it is contrary to the facts.

All I have to say in conclusion is that the question is simply this: Is it more important to provide munitions of war or to respect the jurisdiction of this committee? Is it more important to send the things which would enable the boys at the front to do the things which they did at Chateau-Thierry? Is it more important to enable them to drive the Germans back, or is it more important to wait until sometime in the indefinite future when the Committee on Foreign Affairs may agree upon a bill? The only member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs who has talked on the subject of an agreement is the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], and he says he does not think any bill is going to be reported to which he can agree; and from my observation of that committee I say I think they are as far from an agreement now as they were in May, when they undertook the consideration of their bill. I do not believe they have made any progress, or that they can come before you and promise that there is any likelihood of an agreement.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am anxious to see action taken with reference to further development of power at Niagara Falls, but I do not believe that Niagara Falls and Niagara River should be put into the same category as the other navigable waters of the country.

My friend and colleague, Mr. DEMPSEY, has spoken of the patriotism of these power companies and of their willingness to go forward with development without regard to expense and without reference to their possible reimbursement. Now, what has happened is this situation: Mr. Bulkley and Gen. Keller, representing the War Department, went to Niagara Falls and Buffalo, and after negotiations finally arranged with the two companies there to get together. The securities in the combined companies are to aggregate their book statements of values. Now, the companies, when they made the application for reorganization, instead of going to the Public Service Commission of New York for approval of their securities and the new organization, went to the State legislature and got passed a special act to approve their securities, because the companies were afraid to go to the public service commission to get the approval. They knew that the public service commission probably never would approve the plan of finance which they had.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman think that the State Legislature of New York, made up of 51 senators and a large number of representatives, is as important a body as three appointed officers of the State government?

Mr. GORDON. Their functions are entirely different.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. We have a public service commission, created for the specific purpose of handling subjects of this kind, and it is not necessary for any corporation to go to the legislature to get a special charter for itself unless it wants something that it ought not to have.

Mr. GORDON. Of course.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. When these people came to Washington before the Committee on Foreign Affairs and presented the same kind of a financial plan which had been presented to the State legislature, we on the committee refused to be either intimidated or coerced to force through that measure. If these companies had come forward with the right kind of a proposition, if they had been willing to have their securities properly inspected and the people properly safeguarded, we would have had no objection to their bill or their financial plan.

On the other side of the river the Province of Ontario is arranging to develop, under complete government control, 1,000,000 horsepower, and over in Canada, just across the river, power is being sold for about one-half what it is being sold for on American territory. The Committee on Foreign Affairs is not holding up this matter because it has any grievance against the companies. It is holding it up merely because conditions are such that the committee believes that special provisions and special plans should be made concerning the development and distribution of power at Niagara Falls on the American side. We want as good a deal as our competitors on the Canadian side of the river have, and that is the only reason why I am against having the Niagara River and the Niagara Falls development excluded from the general water-power bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-two Members, a quorum.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a brief statement in the hearings. Mr. Horton, who represented the Conservation Commission of the State of New York, came down before this Special Water Power Committee to present his views on the subject, and in the outset the chairman of the committee said:

> I will state, Mr. Horton, in order to make it perfectly clear, that we will favor an amendment to the bill which will make it perfectly clear that this bill does not intend to deal with boundary waters. That is the purpose of the committee.

That was the assurance given to the representative of the Conservation Commission of the State of New York when he came down here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the same rule ought not to apply to the development of water power at Niagara Falls and the rapids below Niagara and the rapids in the St. Lawrence River that applies to all the other streams of the country.

I was a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee when this matter was first taken up by Congress a great many years ago, and it was taken up by Congress because certain farsighted gentlemen, realizing the possibilities of developing the water power at Niagara and in the rapids below Niagara and in the St. Lawrence River, had acquired all of the rights that could be acquired outside of Congress and had gotten charters in perpetuity and had started to develop the water power at these falls, which, in the opinion of the committee and in the opinion of the people of this country, seriously threatened the destruction or the impairment of the beauties of that wonderful natural spectacle.

Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I can not yield. So Congress was called upon by a popular demand all over this country to take hold of the matter in some way to prevent that destruction. So we did. We passed a law which prevented the destruction of Niagara as a wonderful natural spectacle. Then they came and wanted to develop the power in the rapids below Niagara, and Congress extended its protecting arm even to that stretch of the river and forbade those gentlemen to go in there and injure the rapids as a natural spectacle. So these gentlemen went farther down the river and acquired all the rights that could be acquired. The Aluminum Co. of America, which we know is an absolute monopoly, acquired all the rights that can be acquired outside of Congress at the Long Sault, where it is possible to develop anywhere from 800,000 to 1,000,000 horsepower. They acquired that under a charter in perpetuity. As I stated the other day, these are particular water powers, out of the class of others, because they are so wonderfully beautiful that all of the people of this country are interested, and not only the people of this country but the people of Canada and all the world are interested in their preservation. Fifty thousand or perhaps 60,000 people annually go there simply for the pleasure and the profit that they derive from a contemplation of these wonderful works of nature. So Congress has said time and again, at the very outset of water-power legislation, that these particular water powers shall not be so developed as to desecrate these majestic natural spectacles, and for 10 long years or more these gentlemen have been knocking at the door of Congress begging the opportunity, under the exclusive rights that they have already acquired, to come and develop water power there and to injure and seriously impair, if not, as I say their original intention was, to utterly destroy these works of nature which it is the duty of the Representatives of the people of this country to protect.

Now, when this particular committee was created and the representative of the Conservation Commission of the State of New York came down to see what was going to be done with these particular water-power possibilities, the chairman of the committee assured him at the very outset that the committee had no intention of touching them, and that it was the deliberate purpose of the committee to agree to an amendment exempting them from the jurisdiction and authority of this commission.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be modified. The Clerk has the modification.

Mr. WINGO. I object to any modification.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I offer as a substitute the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WINGO. I should like to know if debate is closed by order of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. There are five minutes undisposed of. Does the gentleman from Arkansas desire to be heard? If so, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. WINGO. I shall be glad to be heard.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I ask that my substitute be read now.

Mr. WINGO. I object to the reading of it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think it is unfortunate that those of us who constantly attend the sessions of the House and seldom speak are denied an opportunity to be heard freely on a matter of this importance by the Members who have wasted so much time on this bill. It is also unfortunate that so few Members have been present this afternoon. I have carefully counted, and at no time have I been able to count 100 Members, and the only way a quorum has been counted has been by including the Members fast asleep in the cloakroom. The bill under consideration is a general water-power bill, covering by a general law the control and use of the water power of the country.

The pending amendment seeks to destroy the general nature of the bill by exempting from its provisions Niagara Falls and other power sites of a certain class. The amendment is urged, not because Niagara Falls and the other sites covered by the amendment are not proper subjects for legislation by Congress but simply because Niagara Falls and all matters relating thereto are within the sole jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and for the further reason, it is alleged, that treaty rights are involved at Niagara Falls, and therefore we should not include it in a general law.

Members of the Foreign Affairs Committee say if you will adopt this amendment they will report a bill controlling the water power at Niagara. The trouble with that promise is that it is worn out, having been too often made to the House during the last seven years, and no serious effort having been made to meet it. To offset this we have the letter of the Secretary of War, urging for war reasons of the most urgent nature that Niagara be included and something definite be done at once. No treaty right is involved. The treaty is executed, we, under its terms, getting so much water; and all that is proposed by this bill is to regulate and control the use of water power that is conceded to us by the treaty. Canada can have no interest in how we allot our portion of the water, the manner in which we regulate its use, and the control and restrictions we exercise over it.

Adopt this amendment and you leave Niagara Falls uncontrolled until such time as the Foreign Affairs Committee sees fit to act, and judging by its former conduct no reasonable hope can exist for early action. Not only will the adoption of this amendment leave Niagara uncontrolled, but you will cripple the efforts of the War Department and also destroy the general character of your proposed legislation. But, you say, Niagara is different. It is true, and it is also true that every water-power site is different from every other water-power site; but that does not make it impracticable to have a general law governing and controlling the use of all of them. Make an exception in favor of Niagara, and then those who desire control and use of sites on the Illinois River will use it as a precedent, claiming that the situation on the Illinois is peculiar, and as a result special legislation will be urged and enacted for each site, and the whole become a farce, so that in a few years the courts will have to decide what particular law is applicable in any given case.

If you are going to enact a general water-power bill I am for it, provided you adopt the Ferris amendment; but whatever is adopted let it be general and include all sites, and thereby avoid the evils and confusion of special legislation. I know very little about Niagara, and care nothing except for the public good, and having confidence in the War Department I shall vote against the amendment.

On the bill as a whole I believe the President is right, and shall vote for the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] to recommit the bill. If that fails, I shall then vote against the bill, as I am opposed to the recapture clause of the bill and am not surprised that it is thought the President will veto it if the Ferris amendment is not adopted. The recapture cause is the vital part of the bill. So let us keep the bill a general one by voting down the Harrison amendment, then adopt the Ferris proposal, and we shall have a law that can be supported and defended and under which our water power can and will be fully and fairly developed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 9, after the words "San Francisco," insert the following: "Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the waters of Niagara River, Niagara Falls, or of any other waters that form a part of the boundary streams of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, and which are subject to treaty provisions."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) they were—ayes 51, noes 43.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DEMPSEY and Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 64.

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 9, page 54, add a new section, as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed as conferring any jurisdiction or authority in the commission over any streams or water which forms in part the boundary between the United States and Canada, except over the waters of the Niagara River at the Falls of Niagara and above the rapids."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the vote now recur upon the original amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the substitute having been defeated.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. As I understand it, we agreed to vote upon the substitute instead of the original amendment; it was modified by unanimous consent.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no; I objected to that.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that we were voting upon the substitute. I asked unanimous consent to modify the amendment in accordance with the provisions of the substitute, but it was objected to, and I then offered it as a substitute. The vote first came upon the substitute, and that is what the tellers were called on, and the vote now recurs on the original amendment.

Mr. WINGO. There is no question about it; that is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is not my understanding.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw any point of order, just so long as there will be no debate upon it.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman can not withdraw my point of order.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] simply modified his amendment, and that the modification was made with the consent of the committee, and that it was voted upon as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the gentleman from Mississippi offered the amendment which was just voted upon as a substitute. That was voted upon and was reported as a substitute by the Clerk. The question now recurs upon the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi) there were—ayes 24, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I now offer my amendment, which I sent to the desk and which has been reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment which the Clerk has reported.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that the commission created under the bill shall have no jurisdiction over any boundary waters except those in the Niagara River at the Falls and above the rapids. In other words, they would not have any jurisdiction over the rapids below the Falls or over any boundary waters in the St. Lawrence River. I do not care to discuss the matter further. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I understand there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] has an amendment pending, also the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a matter at the bottom of page 37, to the words in line 24, beginning "but in no case," and I asked the chairman of the committee yesterday what that meant. He said he was going to confer with some expert in the department.

Mr. SIMS. That is with reference to power.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes. The language is:

But in no case shall a license be issued free of charge for the development and utilization of power created by any navigation dam and that the amount charged therefor in any license shall be as nearly as possible that ascertained by the commission to be the value of such power.

My amendment is to strike out all of that paragraph after the word "dam," in line 2, page 38.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have had no opportunity to confer with the gentleman who drew the bill, consequently I do not know what was intended or not intended, so far as having conferred with him is concerned, but on account of the bill having been drawn by a departmental committee and having been considered by engineers and lawyers and the three Secretaries, and I do not know how many others, I do not feel willing to consent to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. There is no amendment pending, is there?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has an amendment pending.

Mr. RAKER. He can not offer an amendment without returning to that section.

Mr. SIMS. We agreed to return to it.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; not for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Oh, yes. What else are you going to return to it for?

Mr. RAKER. For nothing.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the word "dam," in line 2, page 38, down to and including line 5. Now, Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of paragraph (e), page 37, line 10, are these words:

(e) That the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges in an amount to be fixed by the commission.

That is all right, of course. Then there is this remarkable language, beginning at the bottom of that page. However, before that it provides that power can be granted free to certain people, and then it says:

But in no case shall a license be issued free of charge for the development and utilization of power created by any navigation dam.

Now, listen:

And that the amount charged therefor in any license shall be as nearly as possible that ascertained by the commission to be the value of such power.

In other words, if a man goes on a navigation dam and constructs the necessary plant and develops the power he is excepted from this general provision here that he pay reasonable rates, but the measure of the tax that he shall pay is whatever the value of the power may be that he produces. That, of course, is ridiculous. No man is going to develop power there at tremendous expense and pay back to the Government the value of the power. The language of (e) is that the licensee shall pay to the United States reasonable annual charges. This provides that at a navigation dam, whatever power is produced, the value of the power that he produces he will have to pay the Federal Government for the privilege of producing it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it not a fact that a navigation dam under this bill has been defined to be a dam built by the United States?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; that is not the fact. A navigation dam is defined under this bill as a dam built by the United States with or without contribution from other sources, so if an individual or corporation should go in with the United States to construct a navigation dam with the understanding they should have the power, then whatever power they produce, why, the Government taxes them the value of it for the privilege. Take one illustration. As I stated here the other day, down on the Black Warrior River at that dam 63 feet high we took out two dams and made one dam do the work of three in order to have a level of 63 feet deep. We provided at that time that the foundation should be so constructed that it will be possible hereafter to develop water power there. Now, some development company would come along and make a contract with the commission to go to this dam on the Black Warrior River and develop power. This is a navigation dam, and under this language, if I construe it right, the commission would have to say, "Very well; you can go and develop the power, but we will charge you whatever the value of the power happens to be for the privilege of developing it."

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. When the gentleman raised that question, he will remember, I suggested that an amendment of this nature would cure the defect. After the word "power," strike out the period and insert a comma and add this language:

Less a fair return on any amount the licensee may have contributed to the construction of such project.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It occurs to me what he ought to pay is a reasonable annual charge. The commission have the right to fix a reasonable annual charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The committee divided.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 2, after the word "dam," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is again on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment and possibly the gentleman from Mississippi may accept it, and that is simply to say, after the word "dam," "and that the amount charged therefor in any license shall be such as determined by the commission."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Of course that is entirely satisfactory.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I desire consideration of the amendment which I offered yesterday and which is now pending if all amendments to the bill under the five-minute rule have been made. I would like to have the amendment read.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan yesterday.

Mr. FERRIS. Let it be reported.

Mr. ANDERSON. It will take 10 or 15 minutes to read it.

Mr. FERRIS. You can not tell whether it is subject to a point of order unless it is read. It never has been read, and I ask that the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan was offered for information of the committee and has never been reported to the committee properly as an amendment.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, a suggestion. Will the gentleman from Michigan give the salient points of the difference between the proposed amendment and the existing bill and have the amendment entered in the RECORD as having been read? It will take 20 minutes at least to read it.

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; but some Members have expressed a desire to have the amendment read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, you can not consider an amendment until it is reported.

Mr. DOREMUS. I think it has to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read a portion of the amendment as follows:

Mr. DOREMUS moves to amend by striking out everything in the bill after section 2, on page 24, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That the words defined in this section shall have the following meanings when found in this act, to wit:

"'Public lands' means such lands and interest in lands owned by the United States as are subject to private appropriation and disposal under public-land laws. It shall not include 'reservations,' as hereafter defined.

"'Reservations' means lands and interest in lands owned by the United States and withdrawn, reserved, or withheld from private appropriation and disposal under the public-land laws, and lands and interest in lands acquired and held for any public purpose.

"'State' means a State admitted to the Union, the District of Columbia, and any organized Territory of the United States.

"'Municipality' means a city, county, irrigation district, drainage district, or other political subdivision of a State, competent under the laws thereof to carry on the business of developing, transmitting, utilizing, or distributing power.

"'Municipal purposes' means and includes all purposes within municipal powers as defined by the constitution or laws of the State or by the charter of the municipality.

"'Navigation dam' means a dam or other work, constructed or owned by the United States for the improvement of navigation, with or without contribution from others, from which flows surplus water not needed for navigation that may be disposed of under the provisions of this act.

"'Project' means a complete unit of improvement or development, consisting of a power house, all water conduits, all dams and appurtenant works and structures (including navigation structures) which are a part of said unit, and all storage, diverting, or forebay reservoirs directly connected therewith, the primary line or lines transmitting power therefrom to the point of junction with the distribution system or with the interconnected primary transmission system, all miscellaneous structures used and useful in connection with said unit or any part thereof, and all water rights, rights of way, ditches, dams, reservoirs, lands, or interest in lands, the use and occupancy of which are necessary or appropriate in the maintenance and operation of such unit.

"'Project work' means the physical structures of a project.

"SEC. 4. That the commission is hereby authorized and empowered—

"(a) To make investigations and to collect and record data concerning the power industry and its relation to other industries and to interstate or foreign commerce, and concerning the location, capacity, development costs, and relation to markets of power sites, and whether the power from navigation dams can be advantageously used by the United States for its public purposes, and what is a fair value of such power, to the extent it may deem necessary or useful for the purposes of this act

"(b) To cooperate with the executive departments and other agencies of the Government in such investigations; and for such purpose the several departments and agencies are authorized and directed, upon the request of the commission, to furnish such records, papers, and information in their possession as may be requested by the commission, and temporarily to detail to the commission such officers or experts as may be necessary in such investigations.

"(c) To make public from time to time such portions of the information secured hereunder as it shall deem expedient in the public interest, and to provide for the publication of its reports and investigations in such form and manner as may be best adapted for public information and use.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that enough of the amendment has been read to indicate that it is an amendment in form to section 2, and the portion of the amendment that has been read is not germane to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to determine.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is offered as an amendment to section 2, and parts of the amendment that have been read are not germane to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. A part of the amendment may not be germane, but after reading the remainder it may all be germane. The Chair can not tell until after it is read. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

"(d) To prepare a comprehensive plan for the construction, operation, and maintenance by the Government of the United States, in accordance with appropriations to be made and authority to be conferred by Congress, of dams, power houses, and other project works necessary or proper for the development and improvement of navigation upon, along, across, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, or upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States (including Territories) and for the purpose of utilizing in the public interest the surplus water or water power from any navigation dam now or hereafter constructed.

"(e) To issue licenses to any State or municipality for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, or other project works necessary or convenient for the development and improvement of navigation, and for the development, transmission, and utilization of power across, along, or in any of the navigable waters of the United States, or upon any part of the public lands and reservations of the United States (including the Territories), or for the purpose of utilizing the surplus water or water power from any navigation dam, except as herein provided: Provided, That licenses shall be issued within any reservation only after a finding by the commission that the license will not interfere or be inconsistent with the purpose for which such reservation was created or acquired, and shall be subject to and contain such conditions as the Secretary of the department under whose supervision such reservation falls shall deem necessary for the adequate protection and utilization of such reservation: Provided further, That no license affecting the navigable capacity of any navigable waters of the United States shall be issued until the plans of the dam and other navigation structures have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. Whenever the contemplated improvement is, in the judgment of the commission, desirable and justified in the public interest for the purpose of improving or developing a waterway or waterways for the use or benefit of interstate or foreign commerce, a finding to that effect shall be made by the commission and shall become a part of the records of the commission: Provided further, That in case the commission shall find that any navigation dam may be advantageously used by the United States for its public purposes, no license therefor shall be issued until two years after it shall have reported to Congress the facts and conditions relating thereto.

"(f) To issue preliminary permits for the purpose of enabling applicants for a license hereunder to secure the data and to perform the acts required by section 9 hereof.

"(g) To prescribe rules and regulations for the establishment of a system of accounts and for the maintenance thereof by licensees hereunder, and by the Government of the United States; to examine all books and accounts of such licensees at any time; to require them to submit at such time or times as the commission may require statements and reports, including full information as to assets and liabilities, capitalization, cost of project, cost of operation, and the production, transmission, use, and sale of power; and to make adequate provision for currently determining said costs. All such statements and reports shall be made upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and on such blanks as the commission may require.

"(h) To hold hearings and to order testimony to be taken by deposition at any designated place in connection with the issuance of any permit or license, or the regulation of rates, service, or securities, or the making of any investigation, as provided in this act; and to require by subpœna, signed by any member of the commission, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence from any place in the United States, and in case of disobedience to a subpœna the commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence. Any member, expert, or examiner of the commission may, when duly designated by the commission for such purposes, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence. Depositions may be taken before any person designated by the commission and empowered to administer oaths, shall be reduced to writing by such person or under his direction, and subscribed by the deponent. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

"(i) To perform any and all acts, to make such rules and regulations, and to issue such orders not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 5. That each preliminary permit issued under this act shall be for the sole purpose of maintaining priority of application for a license under the terms of this act for such period or periods, not exceeding a total of three years, as in the discretion of the commission may be necessary for making examinations and surveys, for preparing maps, plans, specifications, and estimates, and for making financial arrangements. Each such permit shall set forth the conditions under which priority shall be maintained and a license issued. Such permits shall not be transferable, and may be canceled by order of the commission upon failure of permittees to comply with the conditions thereof.

"SEC. 6. That licenses under this act shall be issued for a period not exceeding 50 years. Each such license shall be conditioned upon acceptance by the licensee of all the terms and conditions of this act and such further conditions, if any, as the commission shall prescribe in conformity with this act, which said terms and conditions and the acceptance thereof shall be expressed in said license. Licenses may be revoked only for the reasons and in the manner prescribed under the provisions of this act, and may be altered only upon mutual agreement between the licensee and the commission after public notice given for 90 days.

"SEC. 7. That whenever, in the judgment of the commission, the development of any project should be undertaken by the United States itself, the commission shall not approve any application for such project by any State or municipality, but shall cause to be made such examinations, surveys, reports, plans, and estimates of cost of the project as it may deem necessary, and shall submit its findings to Congress with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate concerning the construction of such project by the United States.

"SEC. 8. That each applicant for a license hereunder shall submit to the commission—

"(a) Such maps, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost as may be required for a full understanding thereof. Such maps, plans, and specifications when approved by the commission shall be made a part of the license; and thereafter no change shall be made in said maps, plans, or specifications until such changes shall have been approved and made a part of such license by the commission.

"(b) Satisfactory evidence that the applicant has complied with the requirements of the laws of the State or States within which the proposed project is to be located with respect to the appropriation, diversion, and use of water for power purposes and with respect to the right to engage in the business of developing, transmitting, and distributing power, and in any other business necessary to effect the purposes of a license under this act.

"(c) Such additional information as the commission may require.

"SEC. 9. That all licenses issued under this act shall be on the following conditions:

"(a) That the project adopted, including the maps, plans, and specifications, shall be such as in the judgment of the commission will be best adapted to a comprehensive scheme of improvement and utilization for the purposes of navigation, of water-power development, irrigation, and of other beneficial public uses; and if necessary in order to secure such scheme, the commission shall have authority to require the modification of any project and of the plans and specifications of the project works before approval.

"(b) That except when emergency shall require for the protection of navigation, life, health, or property, no substantial alteration or addition not in conformity with the approved plans shall be made to any dam or other project works constructed hereunder of a capacity in excess of 100 horsepower without the prior approval of the commission; and any emergency alteration or addition so made shall thereafter be subject to such modification and change as the commission may direct.

"(c) That the licensee shall maintain the project works in a condition of repair adequate for the purposes of navigation and for the efficient operation of said works in the development and transmission of power, shall make all necessary renewals and replacements, shall maintain adequate depreciation reserves for such purposes, shall so maintain and operate said works as not to impair navigation, and shall conform to such rules and regulations as the commission may from time to time prescribe for the protection of life, health, and property. No license hereunder shall have the effect of relieving the licensee from liability for any injury or damage occasioned by the construction, maintenance, or operation of said project works; and the United States shall in no event be liable therefor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order that the amendment being read by the Clerk is not in order. The situation is this: The committee has considered every section of this bill and has adopted each section down to the final section.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] now offers an amendment which strikes out certain sections which the committee has already adopted and seeks to amend certain other sections which the committee has adopted. Now, it is perfectly apparent that it is not in order at this stage of the proceedings to offer an amendment which seeks to change a section which the House has adopted, except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] desire to be heard on the proposition?

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that this amendment is not a substitute for the entire bill. It is an amendment to that part of the bill after section 2, and therefore is an amendment to each such separate sections of the bill, all of which have been considered by the House and adopted.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an explanation. This strikes out the definition of corporation, it strikes out the definition of navigable waters, the definition of net investment, and it goes on then and strikes out a little part of the end of subdivision (d); it strikes out the requirements for subpœna, and it strikes out the first clause of section 7 and the whole of section 8. It is an amendment to certain parts of the bill. I do not see how after you have passed the sections you can say that you will take sections 3 to 26 and amend them in this way.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered is an amendment in the nature of a substitute. It has the same effect as though I had moved to strike out all after the enacting clause and included sections 1 and 2 of the bill we are now considering. I submit to the Chair that under Rule XIX the point of order made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] ought not to be sustained. That rule provides for the offering of amendments by way of substitutes, but that they shall not be voted on until the original matter is perfected. Now, if the Chair will turn to page 380 of volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 5753——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Michigan will permit me to state, the gentleman is right if the amendment was a substitute for the entire bill. But the gentleman amends the bill by adding certain things after sections 1 and 2. The gentleman's amendment is an amendment after section 2, and therefore it is not a substitute for the entire bill, because it leaves in sections 1 and 2 of the original bill. If the gentleman was to incorporate sections 1 and 2 in the amendment and then offer the substitute for the entire bill, the Chair would hold the substitute in order.

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair will permit, if the Chair will look at section 5795 of volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents he will see that when an amendment for the entire bill is sought to be offered it should be offered after the first section has been read, with notice that as the other sections are reached in the reading of the bill the proponent will move to strike out the subsequent sections.

The CHAIRMAN. But that is not the question.

Mr. WALSH. It is in answer to the Chair's suggestion that if the gentleman would incorporate sections 1 and 2 it would be in order.

Mr. DOREMUS. I would be glad to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. At the moment we had finished reading section 1; but the gentleman did not give notice of his amendment until section 2 had been reached.

Mr. DOREMUS. I asked unanimous consent yesterday to offer the amendment and have it pending in the committee, and it was printed in the RECORD for the information of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman must remember that when unanimous consent was given, or, rather, before it was given, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] reserved his point of order, and that is also pending.

Mr. DOREMUS. That is true. There is no question about it. I am perfectly willing to ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment to include sections 1 and 2 of this bill, although I do insist the effect will be identically the same as the amendment now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would have a perfect right to ask unanimous consent to offer his amendment, as he has offered it already by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOREMUS. All I desire, Mr. Chairman, is to get a vote on it. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by including sections 1 and 2.

Mr. ANDERSON. That does not make it in order. The only thing I object to is the consuming of a whole lot of time in the consideration of this amendment. If it were understood that we could have a vote on the amendment without much debate, I do not know that I care to insist upon the point of order against it, but I do not want to stay here and debate this amendment, which ought to be debated, for a long time at this stage of the proceeding.

Mr. DOREMUS. I only desire 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask that we have an agreement to expedite matters as to limiting debate.

Mr. ANDERSON. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. DOREMUS. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota insists upon his point of order, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment, beginning at section 2. Is there objection?

Mr. McARTHUR. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon objects.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, if the point of order is sustained——

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SIMS. I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House the amendments to the Senate bill, together with the recommendation that the amendments that have been adopted be agreed to, and that the bill as amended be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended be passed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended be passed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. I ask that my colleague [Mr. LEA] be excused indefinitely, on account of the death of his son Frederick.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. LEA, be excused indefinitely, on account of the death of his little boy. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. RAKER. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that a separate vote be taken on the amendment on line 17, page 35, and the amendment on line 23, page 37.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote on each amendment.

The SPEAKER. On each of them?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I was going to suggest that there is only one amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. SIMS. The original motion was to substitute what the House has done for the Senate bill.

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I understood.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. It was agreed when the House went into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill to consider the House amendment as an original bill.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] demands a separate vote on each amendment. The Clerk will report the first one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 2, strike out the word "respectively" and insert a period for a comma after the word "agriculture."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 26, strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not understand that the bill was amended in the committee in any such way as that.

Mr. RAKER. I did not quite catch that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 26, strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that amendment was adopted.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Is that 1 to 5 in the present Senate bill or the House bill?

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment to the Senate bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Does the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw his point of order?

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that evidently that amendment did not apply to the printed copy of the Senate bill or the Senate copy.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill was the only bill that was ever considered in the House.

Mr. WINGO. Very well. That will leave suspended in the air three or four words, according to the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not help that; neither can the House. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SINNOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. HUMPHREYS demanded a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] and others demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 17.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-two Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. I move a call of the House.

Mr. WALSH. It is an automatic call. The House was dividing.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of this amendment will, when their names are called answer yea; those opposed will answer nay.

Mr. QUIN. What is the amendment, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, strike out lines 1 to 5, inclusive.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the language proposed to be stricken out be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the language proposed to be stricken out will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Navigable waters" means all streams or parts of streams, and other bodies of water or parts thereof, over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to strike out the language. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 214, nays 46, answered "present" 2, not voting 168, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced.

Until further notice:

Mr. OLNEY with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. SWITZER.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY with Miss RANKIN.

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. BELL with Mr. WARD.

Mr. EAGAN with Mr. PARKER of New York.

Mr. GALLIVAN with Mr. KIESS.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. WILSON of Texas with Mr. FARR.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. ROUSE with Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. GALLAGHER with Mr. LUFKIN.

Mr. POLK with Mr. DOWELL.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. LEHLBACH.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY]. I voted "aye." I wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present the doors were opened.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the rest of the amendments, except the ones on which a separate vote is demanded, be agreed to en bloc.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the rest of the amendments, except the ones on which a separate vote is demanded, be agreed to en bloc. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: "Amend, page 35, line 17, after the word 'development,' strike out the word 'irrigation.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 23, after the word "or," strike out the word "irrigation" and insert in lieu thereof "other beneficial."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. FERRIS and Mr. WALSH rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I am.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I also am opposed to the bill, and I desire to offer a motion to recommit. Under the rulings heretofore made by the Speaker, as I understand it, I am entitled to preference.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is not a member of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair has held heretofore that a member of the minority, opposed to the bill, is entitled to recognition in preference to a member of the majority, even though the member of the majority be a member of the committee.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe under the rule that I am entitled to recognition to move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. HAUGEN. I am a member of the committee and of the minority, and I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rose and gained recognition first.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman was asked for what purpose.

Mr. FERRIS. I am the ranking member of this committee, and I am opposed to this bill. I think I bring myself within the rule. I think I am entitled to have this motion put. I filed a minority report upon this bill also.

The SPEAKER. The Chair laid down the rules covering a motion to recommit in the first Congress that he was Speaker. It is a triple condition. The first one is, if anyone is opposed to the bill, if one man is and no one else is, the one who is out and out opposed to it is entitled to recognition. That is condition No. 1. The second one is the mandate in the rule that a member of the minority shall be recognized in preference to a member of the majority. The Chair has ruled half a dozen times that that does not mean a political majority and minority, that it means a majority and minority on the bill. The third condition is that a member of the committee has preference over the other Members of the House equally qualified. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], a member of the committee, the second member upon it, makes a motion to recommit. Of course, the contention of the gentleman from Oklahoma that he received recognition has nothing to do with the matter. He has every qualification, however. In the first place, he is a member of the committee. In the second place, he is opposed to the bill out and out, and in the third place, so far as the Chair can ascertain at the present time, he is a member of the minority—that is, in a minority touching this bill. The Chair does not know how it is going to turn out on the roll call, but from the beginning, since the time the bill was first considered, the gentleman from Oklahoma has been in opposition. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] had arisen before the gentleman from Oklahoma, the Chair would have been delighted to recognize him, but the question of majority and minority has nothing to do with the political complexion of the House on a motion to recommit. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized, and the Clerk will report his motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit by Mr. FERRIS: I move to recommit Senate bill 1419 to the Committee on Water Power, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out section 14 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 14. That upon not less than two years' notice in writing from the commission the United States shall have the right, upon or after the expiration of any license, to take over and thereafter maintain and operate any project or projects, as defined in section 3 hereof, and covered in whole or in part by the license, or the right to take over upon mutual agreement with the licensee all property owned and held by the licensee then valuable and serviceable in the development, transmission, or distribution of power and which is then dependent for its usefulness upon the continuance of the license, together with any lock or locks or other aids to navigation constructed at the expense of the licensee, upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the fair value not to exceed actual cost of property taken, plus such reasonable severance damages, if any, as may be caused by the separation of said property from property valuable, serviceable, and dependent as above set forth, but not taken, and shall assume all contracts entered into by the licensee with the approval of the commission.

"The value of such property so taken shall be determined by agreement between the commission and the licensee, and in case they can not agree, by proceedings in equity instituted by the United States in the district court of the United States in the district within which any of such property may be located: Provided, That such fair value shall not include or be affected by the value of any lands, rights of way, or other property of the United States licensed by the commission under this act, by the license, or by good will, going value, or prospective revenues: Provided further, That the values allowed for water rights, rights of way, land, or interest in lands shall not be in excess of the actual reasonable cost thereof at the time of acquisition by the lessee."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is not entitled to make his motion upon the record as disclosed during the debate yesterday, and I submit for the consideration of the Chair in contradistinction to the gentleman's representation at the present time——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FERRIS. I demand the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Massachusetts raises a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. During the debate yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], while the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] had the floor, asked him if he did not think the best thing to do with the bill was to defeat it. The gentleman from Oklahoma said:

I do not; I have tried here for years; and I want to try a little longer to help get this bill through.

If the gentleman is opposed to this measure in the face of that statement I submit that he does not come within the rule respecting the minority as set down by the Speaker, dividing between those who are in favor of the bill and those who are against it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma rose and offered his motion, and the Chair asked him, as he would have asked anyone else, as he has always done, except one day when he forgot, if he was opposed to the bill, and the gentleman from Oklahoma answered without any equivocation or hesitation that he was.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the language which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] read could well be interpreted to mean that the gentleman from Oklahoma wanted the bill perfected. He could not tell what the bill would be when it came to a final vote, but as it is now up to the House he is opposed to it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], if the Chair will indulge me, evidently has not read the RECORD, because the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma just before he replied to that query in response to the gentleman from Kentucky was this:

Mr. THOMAS. Does the gentleman not think, to be plain about this matter, that this bill is purely a socialistic bill?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, of course I think this is a good bill.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to point out to the Speaker that was before the vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, which he now makes a basis of his motion to recommit.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I scarcely think it is necessary to be heard on the proposition. [Laughter.] Gentlemen may laugh on that side and pick up a colloquy in debate and say that is not my position if they like, but that would not deter me from doing my duty or presenting my views here. When this bill was reported——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to hear the gentleman. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], in the judgment of the Chair, stated this case exactly as it is and stated it in the fewest possible words.

Mr. FERRIS. I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman withhold his motion?

Mr. FERRIS. No, sir; I will not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to finish his decision. What the gentleman from Oklahoma thought yesterday the Chair does not know. [Laughter.] The bill may have changed for all he knows in a dozen different directions. All that the Chair knows about a bill that has been in the Committee of the Whole House or the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is what the chairman reports to him. The Chair does know this, that the gentleman from Oklahoma filed a minority report, and just judging from what the Chair heard when he came in here once in a while he thought that he was leading the fight against the bill. But, however that may be, what he said yesterday or the day before or the day before that has nothing in the world to do with the answer that he gave the Speaker when the Speaker propounded the acid test. [Laughter and applause.] So the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts is overruled.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FERRIS. Division, Mr. Speaker. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker, to save time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays; evidently there is a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 133, answered "present" 2, not voting 167, as follows:

Mr. HAMILL with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PROHIBITION IN ESTABLISHED WAR-PLANT ZONES.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk Senate joint resolution 172, that has just been placed there, and put it on its passage; and I would like three minutes in which to state to the House my reasons for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks three minutes in which to state the merits of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, let us have it reported.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would be glad to have it reported first.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this joint resolution, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have spoken with the gentleman from Minnesota about this resolution, but I have not had a chance to examine it. I knew not what its provisions were until it had been read, and I do not know whether the Speaker would refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs or to the Committee on the Judiciary; but this is a measure of such importance that I should think it ought to go to some committee for consideration before action is taken by the House. If it goes to the Committee on Military Affairs, I promise the gentleman that the Committee on Military Affairs will take early action one way or the other on it. If it goes to the Committee on the Judiciary, that, of course, is another question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would refer it to the Judiciary Committee; that is to say, he would if he had to refer it at all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This matter is of immediate importance; as I said to the gentleman, of critical importance, and I really would like three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks for three minutes in which to explain this resolution before the Chair puts the question of consideration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this Senate joint resolution, which passed the Senate this afternoon, contains in exact phraseology a proviso that has been adopted by the Senate to the Agricultural bill. It is not the general prohibition amendment, but a proviso to it.

A condition has arisen at the head of Lake Superior in which Government works are seriously menaced. Ten thousand men engaged in shipbuilding and in the production of munitions are to-day being debauched by artificially created conditions that are beyond the power of either Minnesota or Wisconsin to control. The cities of Duluth and Superior are both "dry." The entire head-of-the-Lakes region is "dry," but a group of about 30 men have organized a village in the State of Wisconsin for booze purposes alone. They have one saloon and eight wholesale houses that constitute the entire village.

This has come to be a hell hole of iniquity. The War Department and the Department of Justice have tried in vain under the law as it stands to control it. We presented the matter to the Secretary of War and the Acting Secretary this morning, and I will say that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the two Senators from Minnesota, a member of the Public Safety Commission of Wisconsin, the mayor of the city of Duluth, and the commissioner of public safety of Duluth, all here, united in a request for immediate action.

It is a serious situation. It was the view of the Secretary that only by the passage of additional legislation could he control the situation. Therefore we agreed upon this resolution. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if he has not in his possession a letter from the Acting Secretary, Mr. Cole, asking that this be passed at once. That is the only reason for it. I ask you for the protection of these industries that you pass the resolution. So I sincerely trust that no objection will be had. There was no objection on the part of any Senator. I submitted it to gentlemen of the House that I thought might be immediately interested in it and there was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GARD. May I ask if the gentleman submitted it to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I did, and he said he had no objection. The gentleman from Alabama submitted it to him in my presence, and he said he had no objection to it.

Mr. GARD. I wanted to be assured whether the chairman was willing to have it considered.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, that is all I care to say. I have made the request for unanimous consent for immediate consideration. My reason for that is that we are to take up the revenue bill to-morrow, and I did not want to ask the House to interrupt that bill, for I am sure my request would be refused. This is something that the immediate minute asks for, and I trust that no one will object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I object. It is the first time in my life that I have ever done a thing of that kind. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal on the subject of draft legislation and newspaper comments on the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes on the draft and newspaper comments. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow the House is expected to take up the revenue bill. I do not think we ought to have other subjects brought up, and I object.

FUNDS OF OSAGE TRIBE OF INDIANS IN NATIONAL AND STATE BANKS (H. DOC. NO. 1270).

The Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Interior, which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 5, 1918.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: Pursuant to House resolution 322, calling for information as to the amount of money on deposit in State and national banks on April 1, 1918, belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes and the Osage Tribe of Indians and to individual members of said tribes, I am inclosing herewith an alphabetical list giving the name and address of each bank, the amount of deposit in each, and the rate or rates of interest paid by each bank.

In this connection I wish to point out that the tribal funds of the Five Civilized Tribes have been deposited in the State and national banks of Oklahoma in accordance with the act approved March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. L., 1070). Banks of Oklahoma were also used for the individual Indian moneys until the amount of funds available for deposit became so large that the Oklahoma banks which qualified as depositaries under the regulations were not able to handle it. The records of the Indian Office show that all the State and national banks in Oklahoma were notified that funds were available for deposit and were invited to apply therefor, but even after all the applicant Oklahoma banks which qualified had been given deposits there still remained the sum of $2,000,000 or more, and in order to get this money on an interest-bearing basis and to provide also for additional sums then rapidly accruing bids on individual Indian funds were invited from banks outside the State by the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes, with the result that interest amounting to thousands of dollars was thereby saved to the Indians. The superintendent of the Osage Agency also invited outside banks to bid on funds under his jurisdiction as occasion arose.

It was the practice to accept any bank of sound financial standing which offered not less than 3 per cent on open accounts, 4 per cent on a time deposit of 6 months, or 4½ per cent on a time deposit of one year. At no time was any qualified bank in Oklahoma denied a deposit. Indeed, despite the effort to place all available funds in banks there was for two years approximately $2,000,000 of tribal funds lying idle because of the failure of Oklahoma banks to qualify therefor. In this connection I quote from a letter addressed to Hon. William H. Murray on January 14, 1916, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

"For the last two or three years we have not had a sufficient number of banks in Oklahoma to care for all the funds available, and if any other (Oklahoma) banks can qualify I shall be glad to give them deposits at once."

It was often difficult to get Oklahoma banks even for such deposits as it was desirable from an administrative standpoint to keep near an agency. In many instances where this could consistently be done requests of Oklahoma banks for a reduction in their interest rates were allowed in order that the banks might be retained as depositaries.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2180. An act to approve mutual cessions of territory by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota and the consequent changes in the boundary line between said States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, if those who are responsible for the business of the House to-morrow have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], to which I objected a moment ago, I will withdraw my objection and make no further objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the House to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table for 10 minutes on the draft and newspaper comments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, without having consulted the majority leader, but having consulted other members of his committee, I desire to announce that I will undertake to bring up the Agricultural bill to-morrow before the revenue bill is taken up. My view is that it will not take more than the time to read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is it a conference report?

Mr. LEVER. No; it is a reintroduction of the bill which has been vetoed by the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman announces that he will undertake to bring up the Agricultural bill to-morrow before the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Will there be an opportunity to discuss some of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. LEVER. It will have to come up by unanimous consent if we consider the bill at all. I hope that we can arrange and give the gentleman an opportunity to discuss the provisions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of my work in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of his work in Congress. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, that is not necessary; the gentleman's work has been very full, and I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 6, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WATSON of Virginia, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5115) to authorize the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 770), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII,

Mr. AYRES introduced a bill (H. R. 12881) to increase the cost of the public building at El Dorado, Kans.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FESS: A bill (H. R. 12882) granting a pension to William Wibright; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOSTER: A bill (H. R. 12883) granting a pension to Nancy A. Parker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12884) granting an increase of pension to Lucy V. Duane; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HASKELL: A bill (H. R. 12885) granting a pension to Jacob Johnson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. IGOE: A bill (H. R. 12886) granting a pension to Joseph Roddy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JUUL: A bill (H. R. 12887) for the relief of Grace Omundsen; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LEA of California: A bill (H. R. 12888) for the relief of Martin C. Rucker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 12889) granting an increase of pension to Charles Pickett; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOOHER: Petition of citizens of Maryville, Mo., protesting against the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer or other intoxicating liquors; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, petitions of citizens of Hopkins, Mo., and vicinity and of citizens of Rockport, Mo., for immediate prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of S. K. Pierce & Son, of Brooklyn, N. Y., protesting against the proposed tax on denatured alcohol; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, letter from Henry B. Smith, president New York State Pharmaceutical Association, against the passage of House bill 12787 and urging the passage of the Edmonds bill, House bill 5531; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELSTON: Petitions of various citizens, churches, and other organizations of Alameda County, Cal., favoring wartime prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. IGOE: Memorial of members of the St. Louis Stock Exchange, protesting against tax on brokers as worded in the revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STINESS: Petition of the Victor Cleansing Co., of Providence, R. I., protesting against the proposed tax on naphtha; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Providence (R. I.) Stock Exchange, protesting against the proposed tax on stock brokers; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a petition of S. J. Foster, president Providence (R. I.) Stock Exchange, favoring a tax on stock brokers commensurate with the value of membership involved; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 6, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have committed our way to Thee. Our resources are consecrated to Thy service. What we have and what we are we are ready to lay upon Thy altar, for Thou dost lead us on amid the conflict of the present time. Give us to-day a renewed sense of our divine obligation, that we with the utmost care may move forward with unity of purpose, with high ideals, with a deeper consecration than ever in the great cause to which we have committed ourselves. Grant, we pray, that the day's record of our service may tell for the advancement of human civilization and for the glory of Thy name. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, September 4, 1918, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House:

S. 934. An act authorizing the State of Montana to select other lands in lieu of lands in section 16, township 2 north, range 30 east, within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project and the ceded portion of Crow Indian Reservation in said State:

S. 936. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Bozeman, Mont., certain land for alley purposes;

S. 4597. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.; and

H. J. Res. 325. Joint resolution amending section 8 of the amendment to the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

WINSTON-SALEM SOUTHBOUND RAILWAY CO. (H. DOC. NO. 1268).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting a copy of the report of the commission in valuation docket No. 5, Winston-Salem Southbound Railway Co.; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator withhold that for a moment? I want to be heard on a matter of privilege.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well; but I thought we might have a quorum.

MEMORIAL TO JAMES BUCHANAN.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege.

Some anonymous well-wisher has sent to me an editorial published on the 21st of July in the New York Evening Sun, entitled "A strange error in the Senate." It will not be necessary for me to read this editorial in full. I can state the purport of it. It charges that in the discussion of the joint resolution authorizing the construction of a statue to James Buchanan at Meridian Park, this city, the Senator from Pennsylvania stated, and perhaps it was one of the most persuasive arguments used, that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania had by a unanimous vote of its legislature set aside Wheatlands, the estate of James Buchanan in Lancaster County, Pa., as a memorial to her distinguished son, upon which property a monument to James Buchanan had been constructed.

The editorial then goes on to quote from some observations that were made in the House of Representatives and from some matter that was introduced into the RECORD in the House of Representatives, a letter from the recorder of deeds of the county of Lancaster, Pa., which shows that Wheatlands, the place where James Buchanan died, had not been taken over by the State of Pennsylvania and there was no monument erected to James Buchanan upon that property, and that the property was purchased some 20 years ago by a family whose name I have forgotten, but that is immaterial, who are the present owners and occupiers of the land.

This editorial further reflected upon the late Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. GALLINGER, who, in a short speech that he made favoring the passage of the joint resolution, said that he had forgotten, until it had been mentioned by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the State of Pennsylvania had taken over this property as a memorial to her distinguished son, but that the mentioning of that fact by the Senator from Pennsylvania had revived his recollection, that he knew then that it had been done, and he attached considerable importance to that fact. Of course the astute editorial writer drew the just conclusion that the Senator from New Hampshire could not have remembered a thing unless it had actually happened, and here was the conclusive proof that it was not true.

This seemed to me to be of sufficient seriousness to call for some explanation. I must say that the statement contained in the editorial, the statement made in the House of Representatives, and the letter from the recorder of deeds of Lancaster County are absolutely correct, and that I was in error in making the statement to which I have referred. But, Mr. President, this is about as good a case as I ever knew to illustrate the old couplet—

Strange what worlds of difference be
'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee.

The fact is that the State of Pennsylvania did not take over the place of Buchanan's death and consecrate it as a memorial to his memory, but it took over the place of his birth, namely, Stony Batter, in the county of Franklin, Pa. So the recollection of the late senior Senator from New Hampshire as to the substantial fact that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania had honored her son by taking over and making a perpetual park of a portion of the soil of that State is absolutely correct.

Lest there should be any doubt in the future as to what the Commonwealth did, I ask leave to read the material section of the act of the assembly which was passed by the unanimous vote of both branches of our legislature. Omitting the inducing clauses of the act, the material section is this:

That the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania be authorized to accept a conveyance in fee simple from Lawrason Riggs, surviving trustee under the will of Harriet Lane Johnston, deceased, of a tract of land in the township of Peters, county of Franklin, and State of Pennsylvania, containing 18¾ acres, adjoining lands of D. W. Unger, J. W. Poffenberger, Mercersburg Water Co., and Frank Bailey, having thereon erected a monument marking the birthplace of James Buchanan, fifteenth President of the United States: the said tract of land to be preserved by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as a memorial of her distinguished citizen.

Now, Mr. President, if under the circumstances an apology is due from me to the Senate, I make it with due humility; but it does seem that if "flattery can stir the dull, cold ear of death," and the distinguished shade of Buchanan could learn that it was the place of his birth rather than the place of his death that was hallowed by the State, he certainly would be pleased.

I ask that this editorial to which I referred be printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A STRANGE ERROR IN THE SENATE.

When the Senate had under consideration the resolution to accept a statue of James Buchanan, to be erected in Washington, there was rather a prolonged debate, not wholly free from acrimony. Senator LODGE presented, with his habitual force and conciseness, the opinion of those who do not hold the political memory of President Buchanan in high esteem. Senators KNOX, of Pennsylvania, and SMITH, of Maryland, who were the most effective advocates of the acceptance of the statue—the gift of Mr. Buchanan's niece, the late Mrs. Harriet Lane Johnston—gave great weight to honors said to have been paid by the people of his own State to the memory of Pennsylvania's only President of the United States. One argument, pressed with much insistence and eloquence, was the alleged fact that both houses of the Pennsylvania Legislature, without a dissenting vote, had passed a resolution to take over the Buchanan estate, "Wheatlands," adorned with a statue of the late President, and to maintain the establishment in perpetuity as a public park. Referring to this, Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, said:

"Mr. President, I was greatly impressed by the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]—a matter that I had known before but had forgotten—that by a unanimous vote of both houses of the legislature the great Republican State of Pennsylvania has recognized James Buchanan to the extent that it has purchased the beautiful estate, 'Wheatlands,' of which he himself was so fond, and has made it a memorial at which the citizens of Pennsylvania can meet and recall the services of the man whom they honor and respect, whether we do or not."

But now Representative BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, of Pennsylvania, has presented in the House apparently incontrovertible documentary evidence that never, by legislative enactment or otherwise, has the State of Pennsylvania taken over "Wheatlands." Still less has it converted the place into a public park in memory of President Buchanan or anybody else. So far from the State having erected a statue to Buchanan, Mr. FOCHT is responsible for the assertion that the only monument to him in Pennsylvania is one paid for by his niece Mrs. Johnston, which stands in a ravine west of Foltz, Franklin County, near the site of the statesman's birthplace.

In support of this, Mr. FOCHT offers two letters, one from the recorder of deeds of Lancaster County and the other from the Pennsylvania State librarian. The recorder of deeds writes:

"Former President James Buchanan devised the estate 'Wheatlands' to his niece, Harriet Lane Johnston, who in 1884 sold it to Mary A. Willson. The said Mary A. Willson died intestate, leaving two children, Mary E. Willson and George B. Willson, to whom the same descended under the intestate laws of Pennsylvania and who are the present owners."

The Pennsylvania State librarian's letter is addressed to Mr. FOCHT, as Member of the House of Representatives, and reads thus:

"You ask me whether the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania had ever taken any action looking toward the purchase of the house of James Buchanan, and also whether there was any consideration of a monument to be placed there.

"I can find no act which refers at all to Buchanan in the laws of Pennsylvania except that of 1911 (P. L., p. 21): 'An act to permit the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to accept from the trustees of the James Buchanan monument fund the land in Franklin County on which is erected a monument marking the birthplace of the late James Buchanan.'

"This was put in charge of the forestry department."

If this is true, how were Mr. KNOX and Mr. SMITH misled? How did Senator GALLINGER recall a fact which he had forgotten, which fact has no existence?

It is probable that had Senator LODGE injected into the discussion the two letters quoted above the Buchanan memorial might not have been added to the gallery of statues in the city of Washington.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I renew my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Martin	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Henderson	Nelson	Smoot
Benet	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sterling
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sutherland

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2180) to approve mutual cessions of territory by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota and the consequent changes in the boundary line between said States.

PETITIONS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I present a petition addressed to the Senate by the Chautauqua held at Forest, Hardin County, Ohio, relating to the pending prohibition legislation. I move that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Forest Hill, Md., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1104) for the relief of Edward Stewart (Rept. No. 561);

A bill (S. 1857) for the relief of Patrick McMahon (Rept. No. 559); and

A bill (S. 3602) for the relief of John L. O'Meara (Rept. No. 560).

Mr. KENYON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 562) thereon.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Funds of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 295, submitted by Mr. SHEPPARD on the 3d instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Census be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 4914) to admit osteopathic physicians to examinations for commissions in the medical branch of the Army of the United States, and to provide for their official status, rank, and pay, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4915) providing for the survey and reclamation of arid, swamp, and logged-off lands within the continental limits of the United States and the sale of same upon a system of deferred payment, to soldiers and other citizens; and

A bill (S. 4916) for the purchase of land and water rights on the Okanogan irrigation project, to relieve settlers, and to insure an adequate water supply; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4917) for the relief of Margaret I. Varnum (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am introducing an amendment to the revenue bill (H. R. 12863) exempting the pay of the officers and men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps from taxation under the bill, and I ask that it be referred to the Finance Committee.

If I may say just one word, the officers and men, particularly the officers, of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who live in this city are being robbed right and left by the landlords, by the hotels, and by the dealers in military supplies for their uniforms, and I do not think that Congress ought to be a party to adding to their financial hardships by compelling them to pay a tax on their pay while they are fighting our battles, or preparing to fight them.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Provided, however, That the pay of the officers and men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps shall be exempted from all taxes herein imposed.

ADMISSION OF POLITICAL REFUGEES.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 171. It is a joint resolution which has reference to the admission of certain political refugees into this country who are precluded by the existing immigration laws. Granted permission, I will have read a letter written by the President, addressed to the Senate and House, recommending its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 171.

Whereas the war in which the United States is now engaged has resulted, or may hereafter result, in creating in certain parts of Europe economic conditions of an unbearable nature, compelling the inhabitants of such sections to seek refuge in countries or places distant from their homes; and

Whereas it may have transpired, or may hereafter transpire, that the intelligent, economic, and humane care and protection of such refugees may be furthered by removing them, or permitting them to be removed, from the places in which they have sought refuge to the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," full discretion is hereby conferred upon the Secretary of Labor to admit to the United States, during the continuance of the war and for six months after its termination, aliens who are refugees as herein described, and to make such arrangements as are deemed by him necessary and proper for their temporary sojourn or permanent residence within the United States, their distribution to places within this country where they can be maintained to best advantage, their employment, and for the eventual repatriation of such of them as he may deem it proper or necessary to repatriate after the termination of the war, or after the conditions from which they sought refuge have been abated or ameliorated.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this joint resolution was called to my attention some days ago, and I then understood that its purpose was simply to admit a group of some 1,800 Serbians, whose condition was deplorable and who, it seemed to me, it would be well to admit; but the joint resolution, as I have just listened to its reading—I have not previously examined it—is of the broadest possible character and opens the door to all sorts of immigration. The joint resolution refers to "aliens who are refugees as herein described," but they are not described.

It appears to me that the joint resolution is one upon which we ought to take the advice of the Commissioner of Immigration, and that we should have the Committee on Immigration consider it. I did not know that it was of such sweeping character. I thought it related only to a small number of Serbians under peculiar conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the fact that not only would this joint resolution be in effect during the continuance of the war but for six months after the conclusion of the war. Does the Senator from Oklahoma think that it is a wise provision to allow this class of people to come in for six months after the conclusion of the war?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, my understanding is—and it agrees with that of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—that this proposed legislation was designed to meet a special situation, relating more particularly to about 1,800 Serbians who have been driven from their own country and who are now refugees in Russia. They are subjected to a great hardship, and it was felt that there was an obligation resting upon us to relieve them if we could do so. Personally, I think there is a great deal of force in the suggestion that this legislation ought not to be projected beyond the war, because the exigency certainly would not extend itself so far. I think that language in the resolution ought to be stricken out.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit a question?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. Suppose that in the chaotic condition of Russia 1,800 Bolsheviki should be driven from their homes and be compelled to seek refuge in other countries, would not this joint resolution, if it were enacted into law, give them asylum in the United States?

Mr. GORE. Well, not absolutely. This matter is vested in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and I do not know what sort of welcome he would accord to Bolsheviki.

Mr. President, I will ask to have read at this time a letter of the President transmitting a draft of this joint resolution to the Congress and then abide the fortunes of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the joint resolution ought to go to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the joint resolution has been reported from that committee. It was prepared in the Department of State, I may say.

Mr. LODGE. But the communication which came from the Department of State which I saw related simply to 1,800 Serbians who were named. That is one thing and that is a thing we could all agree on; but this is a general relaxation of all the immigration laws, with a very loose description of the people in whose favor it is proposed to be enacted.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that what he has in mind is the letter which I have requested be read from the President, transmitting this joint resolution to Congress, and I think it also includes the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

Mr. LODGE. But that relates only to these Serbians.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; the description does and the letter does; but the joint resolution is evidently not limited to that particular class.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; it goes far beyond it. I said after reading the letter of the President and of the Secretary of State that I saw no objection to admitting that group of 1,800 Serbians; that I thought would be very well; but this makes no mention of any group; this is a general relaxation of the entire law. In its present form I do not think the joint resolution ought to be considered by the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma who prepared the joint resolution?

Mr. GORE. My understanding is that it was prepared by the Secretary of State. I should like unanimous consent to have this letter read. Then I shall not insist upon unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution. There is obviously objection to it.

I should like to say in this connection that the joint resolution seems to vest the discretion in the Secretary of Labor to repatriate people in his judgment without reference to the wishes of the people themselves. That is a point into which I wish to look further myself. I ask that the letter be read in justification of my request, and then I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the letter is read I want to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that this joint resolution applies to "aliens who are refugees as herein described," and there is not a word in the joint resolution describing any kind of aliens or refugees.

Mr. GORE. I apprehend that evidently the joint resolution was not drawn with sufficient care. Undoubtedly the phrase "as herein described" relates to the letter which I have asked to have read. Of course, the letter would not be effective as a part of the law.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; in law the phrase would relate to what is described in the joint resolution.

Mr. GORE. The reading of the letter will show the Senate what is in mind, and the joint resolution ought to be limited to the class that we have in mind and for whose relief we are seeking to provide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Acting Secretary of State submitting a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the admission into the United States of aliens who are refugees from conditions created by the war.

I earnestly recommend this humane project to the favorable consideration of Congress.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 22, 1918.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 19, 1918.

The PRESIDENT:

There are in Russia about 1,800 Serbian refugees, including 500 children, whom the Serbian minister at Moscow wishes to send to the United States, their situation in Russia under the present conditions, it is stated, being tragic, and especially demoralizing to the children who should be placed in school.

The Department of State is informed that both England and France have received large numbers of Serbian refugees, and it is the department's opinion that the admission of these Serbians into the United States would not only be a humane act but would have a good moral effect in the Balkans.

We are met with the obstacle, however, that as the immigration law now stands, it constitutes what would seem to be, from an executive point of view, an insuperable barrier to the admission of the people under consideration or of other aliens similarly situated—at least it seems apparent that most of them could not land at ports of this country in pursuance of said law. Probably most of them are destitute and, even if entirely free from mental or physical disability of the kind inhibited by the statute, would yet per se be likely to become public charges here. That would be the situation which would confront the immigration officers who would have to pass upon the cases upon the arrival of the aliens at United States ports, unless it should be shown then and there that arrangements had been perfected under which the aliens would be placed in suitable employment in this country at which they could make sufficient to support themselves and those dependent upon them, and arrangements of that character could not be made in advance without violating the spirit and intent of the contract-labor provisions of the statute.

In view of the above, the Department of State took the matter up with the Department of Labor, and it is Secretary Wilson's belief, in which I share, that no department or office of the administrative branch of the Government or organization having a quasi-governmental status or in any way connected with Government affairs should undertake of its own motion to make arrangements to care for war refugees in this country, and that legislative sanction would be required. Accordingly, I have the honor to submit herewith a draft of a proposed joint resolution and to recommend its transmission to the Congress with a view to obtain legislative sanction for carrying out the project with respect both to the aliens immediately concerned and to others who may hereafter find themselves similarly situated in Russia or other European countries. This draft was prepared in the Department of Labor and has the approval of the Secretary of Labor, who states that his department will be glad to give it its support.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK L. POLK,
Acting Secretary of State.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. PHELAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand the Senator from Oklahoma withdraws his request?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 296.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator asks to take that up, I think that the Senate joint resolution (No. 171) just under consideration ought to be recommitted to the committee, and I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF GOVERNMENT BUREAUS FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. THOMAS. I now renew my request for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 296, submitted yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 296. Is there any objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 296), as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, under the powers conferred upon him by the provisions of the so-called Overman Act, and for the purpose of relieving the congestion of population in the District of Columbia, to order the transfer from Washington to other cities in the country for the duration of the war, all bureaus, commissions, and subdivisions of the several departments which can discharge their functions and perform their duties as well outside of said District as within its boundaries, such order to be effective not later than the 1st day of October, A. D. 1918.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator that in line 6 of the resolution the word "all" is used. Would it not be better to use the word "such" instead of "all," because I think that if all the bureaus and commissions and subdivisions and departments of the Government which could do their work just as well out of the District of Columbia should be transferred, it would take away from Washington about three-fourths of the employees of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the suggestion of the Senator is very apt, and I ask to amend the resolution by substituting the word "such" for the word "all," in line 6, and by substituting the word "as" for the word "which," in line 7.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Colorado what provision of the Overman Act gives the President authority to make the proposed transfer?

Mr. THOMAS. I think that the scope of the act is amply sufficient for that purpose, and I think, also, that independently of it the President has that power.

Mr. KNOX. Would not the same object be attained and there be no doubt about it—because there is doubt in my mind as to whether the Overman Act covers it—by having the resolution read "the President is hereby requested," and so forth?

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing to exclude all reference to the Overman Act from the resolution.

Mr. KNOX. Then, if he is already authorized to do it, there will be no question about it.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. President, I ask also to eliminate from the resolution the words, in lines 2 and 3, reading "by the provisions of the so-called Overman Act and."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if this is a joint resolution?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I should like to submit to the Senator this proposition: If it requires the authority of Congress or the President to make the proposed transfer, that authority would not be conferred by a Senate resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. I am quite aware of that. The resolution assumes, however, that he has the power, and it is a request of this body only.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the correction made was on the assumption that he does not have the power under the Overman Act.

Mr. THOMAS. I think not. The correction was made upon the assumption that he did not have the power under the Overman Act, but the Senator will probably recall that when Mr. Schwab was placed in charge of shipping construction, the offices of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and other shipbuilding bureaus here were removed to Philadelphia. I take it that the same power would exist, if you please, to remove the Reclamation Service to the State of Nebraska during the war, or any other services, my purpose being, of course, to relieve the congestion in the city of Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to be made at least on the assumption that the President did not have authority. Of course, if he does not have it, the Senate resolution will not confer it.

Mr. THOMAS. If he does not have the authority, a Senate resolution would not confer it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, would it not be better to have the resolution read as follows:

That the President be requested, for the purpose of relieving the congestion of population in the District of Columbia—

And so forth?

Mr. THOMAS. I will amend it any way that does not destroy it and that will enable me to get it through this body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will now state the resolution as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, for the purpose of relieving the congestion of population in the District of Columbia, to order the transfer from Washington to other cities in the country for the duration of the war of such bureaus——

Mr. NELSON. I should suggest at that point that the words "or parts of bureaus" be inserted.

Mr. THOMAS. It would be pretty difficult to divide them up in some instances, I think.

Mr. NELSON. As the Senator has said, when Mr. Schwab took charge of the Shipping Board he transferred over 3,000 men in various branches of that service to Philadelphia from this city.

Mr. THOMAS. I use the words in the resolution, "and subdivisions of the several departments." I am willing, however, to have it read "such bureaus or parts of bureaus."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the President has not already authority, does the Senator think that the Senate alone can give it to him?

Mr. THOMAS. I have just answered that question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unfortunately I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course not. This is merely a request of this body to the President to make these removals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, for the purpose of relieving the congestion of the population of the District of Columbia, to order the transfer from Washington to other cities in the country for the duration of the war of such bureaus or parts of bureaus, commissions, and subdivisions of the several departments as can discharge their functions and perform their duties as well outside of said District as within its boundaries, such order to be effective not later than the 1st day of October, A. D. 1918.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the resolution has not been referred to a committee, as I understand.

Mr. THOMAS. No; it has not.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not wish to be put in the attitude of opposing the resolution; I realize that something of the kind might be accomplished; and yet it seems to me that it is hardly proper for the Senate to make such a request of the President. He knows about the congestion in Washington as well as we do, and if some of the Government bureaus can be transferred without any further authority of law he will probably make such transfer without any such request; but to have the request come from the Senate alone, without consulting the House of Representatives and without a committee having considered it or having made any investigation, it seems to me may not be altogether appropriate. I wish to ask the Senator if he would not be willing to let the resolution be referred to a committee? It could be reported within a few days, and in the meantime the committee could probably make some investigations that might be beneficial.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if this resolution is referred, I think its office, if it can perform any, will be rendered useless. Landlords and sublandlords are giving notices right and left terminating leases and increasing rents beginning with the 1st of October. I am informed that the new officeholders, and perhaps office seekers, are coming to the city at the rate of 500 a day, and the pressure upon accommodations is something frightful.

We can not stand this situation. Something must be done. We can not build houses fast enough to accommodate this incoming population. We all know that landlords will give notices, and whether or not they are prohibited from carrying them into effect under the provisions of the Saulsbury joint resolution, they can make almost unendurable the lives of the families of holding-over tenants receiving such notices. Now, to refer a matter of this sort to a committee means a delay of a number of days, and that, I think, practically destroys the purpose for which I offer it. Certainly the passage of the resolution at this time can do no harm. I do not think the President is as well acquainted with the congested condition of things as Senators and Representatives, who are in daily contact with men and women who are affected and threatened to be affected by these conditions. If the Senate is to do anything with regard to this resolution, therefore, I think it should be done at once.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say that I hope the resolution will pass; but if the Senator from Colorado has not concluded, I will wait until he finishes. I thought he was yielding the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I have concluded, unless the Senator from Nebraska desires to ask me another question?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know that I care to ask the Senator another question. I want to be heard on the resolution briefly before it is disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the floor to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think the resolution ought to pass. It is not possible to build houses fast enough to house the clerks the departments are bringing to this city. They are scouring the towns all over the country for stenographers and clerks, and offering salaries that are taking them away from other employments; and, in fact, the departments are competing with each other right in this city for stenographers and clerks. There is not any question that some of these departments can be moved into other cities. There are cities in this country where the industries have been very much injured, where there are empty office buildings because of the war. I think some of the departments ought to be moved, and that the Senate ought to act on the subject, and act at once.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest an amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I will take only a few moments, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. President, I am not objecting to having something done, and I do not know but that this may be the proper thing; and yet it seems to me that there are some difficulties involved in this procedure that we ought to consider before we pass upon it. There is not any doubt but that Washington is very much overcrowded, and that we ought to have some relief; but I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that simply asking the President to move a lot of bureaus out of this city will present to him for solution some very difficult questions. To any new bureau, just established, the existing objections would not apply; but evidently we are going by a Senate resolution to ask the President to do something that he has authority to do, or else the resolution does not mean anything; and that in itself is something that we ought consider—whether, under all the circumstances, we ought to make such a request.

Outside of that, however, suppose the President undertook to move some of the bureaus in Washington, any one of them, that had been established any great length of time; what would be the effect? There are men and women, men with families, who have been in some of these bureaus for years, established here, who have their homes here, or have arrangements made as a result of which they could not well leave now; and they would be at once moved out of the city and taken somewhere else to establish homes. In any of these bureaus that are in existence now there would be a great deal of difficulty of that kind.

I do not believe we ought to precipitately put that responsibility on the President. It may be that he has given the matter more consideration than we have already; but it seems to me that if we do make a request it ought to be in the shape of a joint resolution authorizing the President to do this, and let the House pass on it as well as the Senate, and then leave it discretionary. Of course, this would still leave it discretionary; but it might be embarrassing to the President to receive a request from the Senate and, if he did not feel as though he ought to comply with it, decline to do so; and it does not seem to me that that will relieve the situation, because it will get us into difficulties as great as those we will escape.

I can not conceive of taking, for instance, the Interstate Commerce Commission—which has a great many employees—out of Washington without seriously interfering with the work of the commission and affecting its efficiency, or almost any other bureau that has a large number of employees, many of whom probably would decline to move, and who would go into other occupations rather than give up their homes and other domestic arrangements that they have already made, and which they could not give up without a great deal of hardship and damage to themselves.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it seems to me that there might be reasons why a compliance with this request would not be in the public interest, even though some divisions or bureaus could perform their duties as well outside of the District as within its boundaries. It is possible that they could perform their duties and their functions as well somewhere else as here, but there might be controlling reasons in the public interest why the bureaus or subdivisions of the departments should not be separated.

I would suggest, after the word "boundaries," inserting the words "where compatible with the public service." In other words, if it is found that these bureaus can perform their functions as well outside of the District as in the District, and it is also compatible with the public service to move them and separate them, we recommend that it might be done; but I can understand very well how it is entirely possible that people could do just as much work and perform their functions just as well in one place as another, and yet there might be controlling reasons why it would not be in the public interest to separate them, and the public service could not be as well performed as where they are together.

I think, therefore, we ought to qualify the language by adding that amendment—that they may be moved outside of the District where compatible with the public service.

It seems to me that we need not be so terribly excited about this matter, either, because, with all these buildings going up, it would look as though provision is being made for all the help that will be needed here. I get the impression from going through some of these departments that they have more people there now than they need. The chiefs and heads of divisions seem to vie with each other in adding always to their force, and the employees are absolutely in each other's way. They can not perform efficient work because there are too many of them, and they duplicate each other's work to a large extent. Of course, the demands are increasing all the time, and I would not say positively that we could economize in that respect.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I do think, however, that with the buildings that are going up, by a rather more strict observance of the real necessities by each of the bureau chiefs and heads of the departments, the situation could perhaps be relieved very materially, at any rate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator if the whole matter is not within the discretion of the President, anyway?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, I think it is; absolutely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. This is merely a suggestion, is it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is quite true.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Really, then, the contents of the resolution amount to nothing, except to call the President's attention to the congested condition here and suggest to him to relieve it by putting some of these people somewhere else.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the President knows of the congested condition, and, I presume, has thought of this matter before, because in some respects action along this line has already been taken. The Emergency Fleet Corporation has been removed entirely out of Washington to Philadelphia, taking several thousand people, and it is possible that other branches of the Government service could be handled in the same way; but we ought to qualify the resolution, it seems to me, by the insertion of language to the effect that this may be done where compatible with the public service, and not just because the work could be done somewhere else as well as here.

I offer that amendment, at any rate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] well suggested that this resolution is merely a request. It asks the President to act; and surely if his action in any particular direction would be incompatible with the public interest he would not do it. I think, therefore, that the amendment is not necessary. I think it is included in the expression "which can discharge their functions and perform their duties as well outside of said District as within its boundaries." I think, too, the Senator is entirely mistaken in his conception of the effect of new building upon this situation. New buildings are going up, but rents are going up a great deal faster; and if the energies of all the contractors and carpenters in the city could be devoted to the matter of public building for housing occupants exclusively, they could hardly keep up with the rate of the influx which we are told is at present going on.

I ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the light of the resolution which has just been offered by the Senator from Colorado, it seems appropriate that I should invite attention to a bill which I introduced several months ago and which is now before the Committee on Public Lands. At a time when we are trying to decentralize the authority at Washington and remove some of the agencies of the Government to other parts of the country, the measure to which I refer ought to receive the support of the Senate. It provides that a branch of the Interior Department shall be established at a suitable place in one of the public-land States west of the Mississippi River, which shall be designated by the President and which shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, or an assistant to be designated by him; that there shall be transferred to said branch from the main office of the Interior Department in the District of Columbia the offices of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, the Reclamation Service, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the National Park Service as presently constituted by law, and that the functions and duties of said offices and bureaus as prescribed by law shall be hereafter performed at the branch of the Interior Department created by the bill; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to remove and transfer from time to time to said branch of the Interior Department all maps, files, plats, and other records of the Interior Department necessary for the proper administration of the duties and functions of said branch.

Aside from the Pension, Patent, and Census Bureaus, the work of the Interior Department relates almost wholly to the public lands of the United States, and these are found in the western part of our country. It would be of immense benefit to the Nation and to those who are interested in the public lands, in the Reclamation Service, in the forests of the United States, in the mineral lands belonging to the United States, if the administrative work relating to these subjects was performed at some central point within the public-land States. There is no reason why a branch of the Interior Department ought not to be established in the public-land States. I am advised that some other countries have established local departments, or subdivisions of general departments, for the purpose of controlling and disposing of public lands, and that such course has proven of great advantage and benefit to the people. It occurs to me that now is the time, when we are attacking this congested condition in Washington, to secure a needed reform and at the same time grant the local relief to which the Senator from Colorado has invited attention.

I therefore take this opportunity to urge that the Public Lands Committee report at the earliest possible moment the bill to which I have just called attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, where compatible with the public service for the purpose of relieving the congestion of population in the District of Columbia, to order the transfer from Washington to other cities in the country for the duration of the war of such bureaus or parts of bureaus, commissions, and subdivisions of the several departments as can discharge their functions and perform their duties as well outside of said District as within its boundaries, such order to be effective not later than the 1st day of October, A. D. 1918.

ARREST OF ALLEGED SLACKERS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution 297 be laid before the Senate at this time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, because I know that there are some Senators interested in this matter who would like to be here during its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Martin	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Guion	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Benet	Hale	New	Smoot
Borah	Henderson	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Sutherland
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Phelan	Townsend
Culberson	Kendrick	Pittman	Trammell
Cummins	Kenyon	Poindexter	Underwood
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kirby	Ransdell	Walsh
Fall	Knox	Robinson	Watson
Fletcher	Lodge	Shafroth	Wilfley
France	McCumber	Sheppard
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Sherman
Gerry	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce absence on important public business of my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate resolution 297, coming over from yesterday under the rule.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me the passage of this resolution at this particular time and the particular object sought to be accomplished ought not to meet with the approval of the Senate. As I view the situation, the proceedings in New York were taken under the Department of Justice, or in connection with some activities of that department, and it strikes me as being an unusual thing to have this matter inquired into by the Military Affairs Committee.

Just what has been done by the military branch of the Government of course I do not know, but we are generally informed, and I think it was admitted on the floor of the Senate yesterday, that whatever had been done was done in cooperation with some officials of the Department of Justice. It seems to me if there is to be an investigation at all, it ought to be done by the Judiciary Committee instead of the Committee on Military Affairs. Moreover, Mr. President, at this time I do not believe that any investigation at all is necessary.

I want to voice my approval of the remarks that were made here yesterday by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] commending the activities of the people of the country in rounding up these slackers. This is no new thing. Similar attempts have been made in other cities. In the city of Chicago, as I understand it from the public press, similar movements were made to round up the slackers, and when the people in a theater in Chicago were asked to line up for examination the mere request was received with applause. In the round-up in that city I understand that something like 800 slackers were found. In the city of Boston the same proceedings were had, as I am informed. No public tumult or furore was made regarding it, but most substantial results were obtained. So in the city of New York I understand that at least 1,500 slackers were found in this general round-up. I understand that there were a few hundred deserters from the Army found in the round-up. For us to investigate any kind of an effort which will bring about such results as that seems to me unworthy of this body. Instead of trying to cast aspersions or to unfavorably criticize such efforts we should commend these actions and as patriotic American citizens hold up the hands of the people who are doing these things and let the people of this country and of the world understand that there will be no slackers in this war and that the slackers, wherever they can be found, will not receive any aid or comfort from the people of the United States, much less from the United States Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator stated that 1,500 slackers were found in the city of New York. Does the Senator know how many innocent men were arrested?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not know how many innocent men were arrested.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In just a moment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to have the Senator answer my question.

Mr. KIRBY. It is on this same point.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well, I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand the papers carried an announcement that over 14,000 people who were subject to draft were rounded up in this proceeding in New York, and something like 1,800 slackers were discovered out of something like 16,000 people.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for the informtaion.

Mr. President, under our system of Government it is usually the case that some innocent people are called upon to suffer for the crimes of others. Whenever there is a murder committed under suspicious circumstances the suspects are rounded up. In the papers recently we have brought to mind instances of just that kind. But does any patriotic citizen want to say that he is unwilling to give information, that he is unwilling to stand up and be counted as an American citizen in order to enable this Government to round up the slackers of the country? I submit that any citizen in such times as these ought to be willing to suffer some inconvenience for the public good, and in such a patriotic cause. To my mind a slacker in this war is just as loathsome as the man who commits murder deliberately, that it is just as much an attack upon society and upon our Government as any crime which is defined in our statute books.

I think the slacker at this time is guilty of the very highest crime known to the law, that of treason against his country. The people of New York were all warned. This was not done in haste. We have all known from the newspapers throughout the country that these wholesale examinations were being made. Moreover, the regulations of the War Department require that these people shall carry with them their registration certificates. Is it not just as easy for them to carry a registration certificate as to require a soldier to wear his uniform?

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. May I ask the Senator what are the men to do for registration cards who are over the draft age and who are under the draft age? There are thousands of those men who were apprehended.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That may be true, and I listened to the remarks made by the Senator from New York yesterday in regard to that very question. If there is an American citizen who happens to be over 31 years of age, but looks younger, should he not be patriotic enough to subject himself to inquiry in order to aid this cause?

If I understand the people of New York correctly, I do not believe that the attitude assumed by the Senator from New York upon this question will receive the approval of the people of the State or city of New York. I believe that the people of that State are patriotic. I believe that they want to lend their support in every way possible to carrying on this war and to bring to justice the people who are trying to evade the duties of American citizens. If a man over 31 who looks younger is called upon to give an account of himself, why should he not do it? When any other crime is being committed any citizen who may have suspicious circumstances surrounding him is always handled as a suspect. Why should it be different here?

It has been noised abroad in this country that the city of New York has been the place where these people are wont to congregate. They hope to be lost in that great city. It affords shelter to them as the caverns shelter the thieves and outlaws of the country. Do you want to harbor them there? I do not believe that you do.

It is well known that 14,000 men were apprehended, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], who were subject to the regulations of the draft law. One thousand eight hundred were apprehended as absolute slackers and went into the retention camp. I am also informed that a few hundred deserters were found. Is there a city in all this land containing such a number of such creatures where the patriotic citizens would not rise up in unison and as one body determine that such criminals so sheltered should be ferretted out and brought to justice? Is there a Senator in this body who would not willingly stay in jail a week, if necessary, in order to have justice meted out to even one such criminal?

Mr. President, if this matter is to be investigated at all, I think the Committee on the Judiciary should do it. It is a matter coming within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report whether or not any investigation is necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I present a telegram received from a citizen of New York, which I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., September 5.

Senator CALDER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

On Tuesday evening I had to go to Jersey City. After exhibiting classification card, form No. 1005, the only one I had received, several times, I was finally ordered off trolley car, together with several others who had similar form classification cards. Demanded reason and was told I had my orders. Crowd assembled in front of station who vouched for me and was allowed to go. The others less fortunate were compelled to stand in line and were held several hours before released. Senator POINDEXTER, if he so desires, can get indisputable proof of unnecessary hardships, humiliation, and indignities forced on a great number of prominent and reputable citizens.

S. T. KRONSKY.

Mr. CALDER. I have a letter from a gentleman whom I know well, whose name shall be withheld for the present. I will read it for the information of the Senate. This gentleman writes me:

SEPTEMBER 5, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just read with satisfaction extracts from your speech of even date denouncing the methods employed by the Government in establishing a reign of injustice under the threadbare excuse of "military necessity."

In detail, my experience is as follows: On the evening of the 3d instant, at about 9.30, I was having dinner at a Brooklyn restaurant accompanied by a young lady, when I was seized by the military police and taken under protest to the seventy-fourth precinct police station, Brooklyn.

At the police station I endeavored to establish my identity with a Dr. Thompson, who was acting for the Department of Justice. I showed him my business card, my personal card, my State and city registration cards, also telegrams, letters, etc., which I had with me. I asked as a request that I might use the telephone to call up my partner, Mr. Frank F. Davis, and was denied this privilege. It would have been a very simple matter as the telephone was close at hand.

I was then thrown into a corral of about 50 men and given no further opportunity to prove the injustice of the position into which I had been placed. In this room at the police station there were no chairs or benches and I was consequently required to stand on my feet from the hour of 10 p. m. until 5 a. m. the following morning. Fortunately, I was able to hire a boy to call up my partner, whose residence is on East Eighty-second Street, New York City, to let him know of my predicament, and he forthwith called up the police station to ascertain what the situation was. He at first talked to a sergeant, who later brought to the phone an individual from the Department of Justice. This individual would not consent to call me to the phone, neither would he take any message. He was insulting to the utmost degree, and characterized me as a slacker. My partner did learn that at a later hour I was to be taken to the Twenty-third Regiment Armory, Brooklyn.

At about 3 o'clock I was walked over to the Twenty-third Regiment Armory, where I was put in behind a rope, corraled with several hundred other individuals. Again, neither chairs, drinking water, nor any comforts were provided, and we were told we would have to remain there until we could get into communication with our exemption board, which would be not earlier than 8.30 the following morning.

The question I wish to ask is, If the Government proposes to seize citizens right and left, why are not the exemption boards in session so that those of us who are innocent could be promptly released?

In my instance, I lacked my card of classification, which was through no fault of my own, as I had twice appeared before the board to get my card, and in each instance had been informed they would send it immediately. When I appeared before them yesterday, they said they were very sorry, that things had been balled up, and they couldn't help it.

At 4.30 a. m. my partner reached me, and through his endeavors and guaranties I was allowed to go home with him. The next morning I got my card of identification, and, as per promise, went back to the armory to clear the matter up. At that hour—11.30 a. m.—there were still a great many unfortunates who were not lucky enough to get off as I had. In instance after instance men like myself were refused the use of a telephone to call up their homes; men with families of children were kept there like culprits.

My only two brothers are serving their country as volunteers, and it is very hard, my dear Senator, to be jeered at on the streets and insulted by local and Government officials, to be dragged and driven from one point to another, when one is entirely innocent, and especially when one has done everything he could to comply with the law and stands ready to serve his country in every way. I have worked on liberty loans and I have done everything I could consistently to help my country, and this is what I get for it.

What are the policies of the Government and how far are you going to go in Washington to make the world safe for democracy? I think in the future you will find a great many people actively inquiring into the steps which you have taken in Washington in the conduct of this war. We have been denied the freedom of the press, and are we now to be denied the fundamental privileges of a free people?

I remain,
Respectfully, yours, ——— ———.

Mr. President, the State of New York has furnished to the draft army over 300,000 men, and it has sent into the service of the country an additional 150,000 volunteers in the Army and the Navy. The loyalty of its people is equal to that of the people of any other State in the Union; but, Mr. President, speaking for my State here and now, I protest with all the power I possess against any further continuation of the methods which were used in the city of New York in the round-up on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Assuming the contents of this letter to be true, and that it can be duplicated in many instances, I think the author of this "round-up" should be dismissed from the public service; and I do not hesitate to say so.

Mr. CALDER. I thank the Senator from Colorado for his comment; and I do hope that some proper steps will be taken here in the Senate in reference to the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not pass it now? We want the information.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. KIRBY. I gather from the reading of that letter that this man who was apprehended as a draft evader or slacker did not have a card from his board showing that he was entitled to exemption and that he had never had one.

Mr. CALDER. He had his State registration card indicating who he was and his age. He had his draft registration card, but he did not have the so-called classification card, which was required by the men in charge of this round-up.

Mr. KIRBY. Then he was subject to be rounded up for not having it, was he not?

Mr. CALDER. He states in his communication that he had repeatedly tried to get this card from the authorities, but has failed to receive it through no fault of his own.

Mr. President, the people of New York want the draft slackers punished, but they object to the methods pursued. This resolution should pass, the investigation should be made, and I trust, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggests, that those responsible for this round-up will be punished.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if this investigation is made, I wish to ask that it ascertain whether any similar procedure is to be attempted in Chicago; for, if so, I should like to advise my friends that they may employ lawyers and get proper means of identification in order that they may not be kept away from their families; I should like to advise them to get ready for it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought the Chair had recognized me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator from Oregon to yield just a moment, that I may give the Senator from Illinois some information which I have in regard to the city of Chicago.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico can do that in his own time. I did not know that the question was put to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, whether the Senate refers this resolution or not is immaterial to me; whether the Senate passes it or not is immaterial to me; but if it is going to be referred—and I do not see any necessity for a reference; I do not see why it might not be passed now—I resent the suggestion that it be referred to any other committee than the Military Affairs Committee, for the simple reason that it involves a matter which refers peculiarly and distinctly to the use of soldiers in rounding up so-called slackers, and the Judiciary Committee does not have any jurisdiction over any such matters.

I am glad to see by the morning papers that the President of the United States has sought, through the Department of Justice, to ascertain the origin of this so-called round-up. I did not think it possible that the President knew anything about it.

Mr. President, I think all will agree that every man who is slacking at this time or who is failing to do his duty ought to be rounded up and that if he comes within Class A he ought to be sent to the battle front in proper time; and if he belongs to some of the deferred classes he ought to be placed in those classes in due course; but what I protest against and what every red-blooded American citizen will protest against is the arresting of men who are below as well as those above the draft age and those who have been exempted for one cause or another without any cause whatsoever. Men of these classes might have happened in New York City.

I have gone there as a young man and knew nobody in the city, and if I had happened to have been arrested there might not have been a friend within a thousand miles who could have come to my rescue or identified me. I might have been only 18 years of age and looked to be over 21, or I might have been 31 years of age and looked to be within the draft age; and yet I could not have resisted arrest and would have been compelled to have stayed in "durance vile" until some meddlesome individual of the Department of Justice or some amateur detective connected with some of these various investigating bureaus was satisfied, after using such diligence as they thought necessary, as to my identity and released me.

Now, what is the course for these people to pursue? Here is a young man, we will say, 25 years of age, who sought to get into the Army but who was turned down for some reason or other. He does not have a card. Why should he be seized and rushed off to a police station? He could have given some account of himself, and the authorities could have verified what he said, and it would not have been necessary at all to have taken him to jail. That is what I protest against, Mr. President.

There are many men who are above 31 who look to be 25; there are many men who are only 18 who look to be above 21. It is these men who will suffer in these unlawful proceedings—men who are not within the draft age but who appear to be.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Oregon a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. Has there not been for some time an effort on the part of the department—and a very proper one—to gather in the slackers, especially in the cities? I have seen notices of slackers being gathered in elsewhere; but has the Senator heard of similar proceedings to this in New York being carried on anywhere else?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. New York is the only city where I have seen any account of such proceedings, and I know that only from the papers. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. LODGE. I know it is stated in the papers that they gathered 700 slackers in the city of Boston, but they did not arrest 20,000 or 30,000 innocent people in order to get the slackers. Nobody has any sympathy with them; but there seems to me to be a defect in method.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true, Mr. President. I am resenting particularly the use of the soldiers and sailors of this country, together with amateur detectives and others, in this so-called round-up, and the arresting of individuals who are not within the draft age.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to ask the Senator from Oregon if it is not the duty of soldiers and sailors in this country to arrest wherever they can deserters from the Army and the Navy?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that may be true in certain cases and when they have authority to do it; but to go about arresting civilians is a thing that has been resented in the Senate more than once. I call the attention of Senators from the South—and I lived in the South at the time—to the great fight that was made against the force bill. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will remember it very distinctly. In that instance southern Senators and the people generally in this country, North and South, resented the use of the military arm of the Government at the polls on election day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator from Oregon if he has been able to discover, or has heard anybody state, by what authority of law these men who are not subject to draft were arrested? I should judge from certain remarks I have heard from certain Senators that, in their opinion, if some slacker may thereby be caught wholesale arrests of innocent people by the Department of Justice or by the Army or the Navy are justified, although such arrests are made in violation of law. Is the Senator familiar with any provision of law that authorizes the Department of Justice or the Army or the Navy, without warrant or writ issued by any judicial officer, to arrest wholesale passers-by on the street on suspicion that perhaps they will get somebody who has violated the law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know of no such law.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am still waiting for some department of the Government to state under what law they pretend to be acting in this matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not any law that authorized them to so act. The facts are about these: Men are afraid to assert their legal rights while this war is going on. Many a man who was arrested in New York, I venture to say, if it had been in time of peace would have resented it to the last ditch and would have killed the lawless individual who undertook to arrest him without some kind of authority, without some warrant; but now while this war is on men are afraid to resent these things even when they know their rights, and they submit because they are afraid of doing something that they ought not to do under the many laws which have conferred great power upon different departments of government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But it seems to me, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to state it at this time—and I apologize for intruding upon him—that if this great Government, founded upon a written constitution and being a government of laws and not of men, is to hunt down lawbreakers it can not with any consistency assume to act the part of a lawbreaker itself.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know of any law authorizing such a proceeding as has taken place; there is no law that warrants it or justifies it. Here is a great city of 5,000,000 people; certain individuals round up 40,000 citizens and get a few hundred slackers. Is there any greater test of the patriotism of such a city than the test that was made by rounding up these respectable citizens of New York and finding so few slackers?

Mr. President, there was no necessity for this proceeding. The national selective-draft law has made treason almost impossible in this country and practically has put the slacker out of business. I venture to say that if every city in the United States was rounded up as New York was rounded up, there would not be found 10,000 men who are evading service in the United States Army. Why? Because the national selective-service law goes into every community in America, no matter how small; it goes into every section of the city of New York, with the result that we find every community from which there has been selected a man to serve in the National Army at his back, ready to report anybody who is not doing his duty to his country, and to have him arrested if need be.

There is not any question that the slackers ought to be pushed to the front; I am not defending them at all; but there is no question that legal methods ought to be resorted to in order to get them to the front. I shall resent here, and I shall resent before the people of the United States whenever an opportunity is afforded me, any such Prussianism as was sought to be carried out in New York. I venture to say that when it is brought to the attention of the President of the United States, he will resent it and will hold somebody responsible for it. In the very nature of things it is impossible for him to know all that is going on in the different bureaus and departments.

The selective-service law is popular. It has been accepted by the people, and to abuse it as it has been abused during the past few days would make it the most unpopular law on the statute books. We should therefore all unite to protect it.

In this connection, Mr. President, I wish to say that I was out of the Chamber for a little while yesterday when the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] referred to a measure which I introduced in the Senate some time ago, but which did not go any further than its reference to the committee. That was known as the spy bill, being Senate bill 4364, "to subject to trial by court-martial persons who endanger the good discipline, order, movements, health, safety, or successful operations of the land or naval forces of the United States by acting as spies in time of war in the United States, and for other purposes."

The Senator from Washington says that I am inconsistent in protesting against what is being done in New York and insisting on the enactment of such a bill as that introduced by me on April 16, 1918. There is no inconsistency about it. Under that bill there was proposed to be established a tribunal to try men, not to send reckless individuals out from the different bureaus at Washington to arrest men without warrant or authority.

It was proposed to create a tribunal to bring spies under its jurisdiction and to mete out to them prompt punishment. It was suggested at that time, as the Senate will remember, that that bill if it were enacted into law would be worse than the Prussianism against which we have arrayed ourselves. Mr. President, if the bringing of spies and traitors under the jurisdiction of a military tribunal be Prussianism, what designation can be given to a proceeding which brings American citizens, innocent citizens, under the jurisdiction of the police courts of New York and other cities without any warrant or any authority whatsoever?

The reasons which existed for the introduction of the spy bill on April 1, Mr. President, are not as strong now as they were then. At that time there were men indulging in German propaganda and in treasonable utterances in different parts of the country, and there seemed to be no way to get at them. The selective-draft law, for reasons I have stated, has made that condition impossible. If the Department of Justice had been as active then in reaching pro-Germans and traitorous individuals as it has been since, there is no question that we might have obtained some net result; but now the department and its emissaries, in order to find one or two young men who are seeking to evade the law, get busy and arrest a whole community, the innocent and inoffensive as well as the guilty. Mr. President, if that was Prussianism in April, 1918, which sought to bring the traitor under the jurisdiction of a military court, what shall we call this act that seeks to bring innocent American men and boys, who have committed no crime whatsoever, under the jurisdiction of police courts? It is an outrage, Mr. President. I venture to say that the communities in which live the boys who have gone to the front will see to it that every slacker, every man who is failing to do his duty will, in due course, be brought to prompt and summary justice and assigned to his proper place in the Army of the United States.

Mr. President, I regret to have to say this; I dislike to criticize any department of the Government, but I shall criticize any and all departments when I think they are violating the fundamental principles of liberty. I have only one life to live, and I propose to point out those things which are being done in violation of law, whether done by my own party or by any other party, by the Department of Justice or by any of the military tribunals of the country.

Having said this, Mr. President, and entered my protest, I repeat that whether or not the Senate adopts this resolution is immaterial to me, but I say if it is referred it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs rather than to any other committee. I am at a loss to know why the distinguished Senator from New Mexico undertakes to have it referred to the Judiciary Committee, which, under ordinary circumstances, would have nothing to do with it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon a question, if he will permit me. I did not know that he had yielded the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I had concluded; but I will be glad to answer the Senator if I can.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator from Oregon in objecting to any unnecessary hardships being imposed upon innocent citizens in the enforcement of the draft act, and I assume that none were so imposed; there is no evidence here that that was the case. I assume that the steps that were taken in gathering together citizens in a certain place were appropriate and necessary in order to investigate and make inquiry whether these men had complied with the draft law and to sort out those who were evading the draft, and those who had deserted from the Army, of whom large numbers were found. Such proceedings as that are common, every-day occurences in the administration of our Government and the conduct of our public affairs.

The Senator from Oregon seems to be indignant because a citizen who violated no law and evaded no duty was put to inconvenience. I wish to ask the Senator a question in connection with that; but, first, I should like to say that it seems to me that the attitude of the citizens involved in this proceeding in New York, knowing that there were a lot of draft evaders and deserters there, assuming that these citizens are patriotic citizens and that they are interested in the uniform and nondiscriminatory administration of the draft law, would be one of willingness to aid in searching out, disclosing, arresting, and holding responsible the slacker who constituted a part of the crowd at the place where they were gathered up. It seems to me that the feeling of a citizen under those circumstances would be one of pleasure in joining with the officers of the law and in putting himself to such inconvenience as might be necessary in order to help and to facilitate the discovery and the arrest of deserters and slackers, and not one of indignation because they might have missed a meal or something of that kind. Now, if there is any showing that there was any bad purpose, or bad motive, or vindictive spirit, or undue or unnecessary punishment of innocent men, that is an entirely different question.

The question that I wanted to ask of the Senator from Oregon was this: If he were a passenger on a ship coming into port, and it was necessary for the Government to find out whether or not there was a man on that ship who had a contagious disease, because it was unlawful for a man with a contagious disease to land, for the reason that it would endanger the health of the community, and the Senator from Oregon had no contagious disease, there was no reason why his landing should be interfered with, but an officer of the Government came along and ordered the Senator from Oregon and every other passenger upon that ship to stand up in line before him and be examined, and to wait there until the time came when a medical officer could reach him and make his examination and report, would the Senator denounce such a proceeding, considering it an infringement of his rights as a citizen?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would if there was not any law for it; certainly I would; but the very thing spoken of in the question of the Senator is authorized by statute. Let me say to the Senator now that I would not resent the proceeding in New York if there had been any statute for it or if there had been any necessity for it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The draft law is the authority for it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is absolutely no authority for it in the draft law

Mr. POINDEXTER. The draft law is absolutely as broad and comprehensive in its scope as the Overman law is, and that means there are no limitations whatever to the authority, and I think in that particular case there ought not to be any limitations. I think the President of the United States ought to have discretion and authority, without limitations being placed upon him, for the enforcement of that law and the adoption of such measures and regulations and the use of such agencies as are necessary to put the draft law into operation; and the law expressly so provides. That is the authority and the law under which it would be done. To say that there should be a great furore and hullaballoo in the country and a sort of fictitious terror and excitement gotten up because some citizens not eligible to the draft were put to some inconvenience is as unreasonable as to hold an indignation meeting because a policeman on a street corner orders an innocent passenger to halt in his car and wait until he gives him permission to go on.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am a little astonished that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] should protest against this resolution going to the Judiciary Committee and want it to go to his committee. There have been some things said here to-day which, if they are true, I would denounce in most unmeasured terms, and the American people are not going to stand for them a moment. One of them is that when men are arrested they are to be confined in our jails and prisons, or in bull pens, and not allowed to communicate with their friends, their lawyers, or their wives. That is what is reported here to-day. Our country is not going to stand for that; and involved in this great question are the very liberties of our people and the Constitution itself.

Where ought that question to be considered? It ought to be considered in the Judiciary Committee, because the charge made here is against the Department of Justice. Mr. Bielaski himself, the head of this bureau in the Department of Justice, assumes the responsibility for it. The President has ordered it to be investigated. Now, these great questions do not belong to the Military Affairs Committee. They belong to the Judiciary Committee, and if the resolution is to be referred anywhere it ought to be referred to the Judiciary Committee to consider these great questions, which are always considered there, and that is the committee that is established for the purpose.

That is all I desire to say about the matter. I ask the Senate to refer the resolution to the proper committee. The Committee on Military Affairs is not the committee to consider these great questions affecting the very liberties of the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield; yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that no legal question is involved in this resolution. The resolution does not cover the case referred to by the letter addressed to the Senator from New York. I wanted it to be acted upon without any question. I did not think the Senate would hesitate for a moment to ask for this information; but if the resolution is to go to a committee it seems to me it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs, because involved in this is the question of who gave the order to the soldiers and sailors. That is all. That is not a legal question in any way.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if it is merely desired to inquire who gave the order what is the use of passing the resolution? Involved in the resolution, and the reason why the Senator introduced it, is the principle involved; and that is what we are all talking about. Can men be arrested without warrant in this country and confined in the jails? I want to say, too, that I have heard of other occurrences in this country where men have been arrested and confined in dirty dungeons and not allowed to confer even with their friends or their lawyers. There is a principle involved, and the Senator introduced the resolution for the purpose of asserting the principle, I suppose, because he would not introduce it just for the purpose of inquiring who gave the order. It ought to go to the committee where it belongs to enable an investigation to be made of this great question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I hope this resolution will pass, and a full investigation made of the outrages and indignities that have been heaped upon not only the citizens of New York but the citizens of my State as well.

I happened to be in New York on the day when the first round-up occurred, and I observed some of the methods employed by the sailors of the Navy and the National Guard of New York in their efforts to find the skulkers from the conscription act. I stood on a street corner and saw soldiers armed with rifles, with bayonets fixed, hold up citizens, compel them to stand waiting while there were crowds around jeering at them, and when they failed to produce their registration cards, which, owing to the fact that no warning had been given these men, they had left at home, at the point of the bayonet they were put in motor trucks and driven through the streets amid the jeers and scoffs of the crowd; they were sent to the armories and held there for hours without food, practically without opportunity of communicating with their relatives and friends in order to procure the evidence demanded by the authorities.

I voted for the conscription act and supported it, and it has been sustained throughout the country willingly. The people have acquiesced in it because they believed that the selective-draft system was a fair system imposed upon the people of this country, and through the system of the local district boards, those tribunals which have passed upon the qualifications of the men, the people have been satisfied with the administration of this law because civil authorities supervised it. However, the Provost Marshal General is held responsible for the enforcement of this act. Therefore this resolution should go to the Military Affairs Committee for investigation. That committee considered the conscription act and presented it to the Senate. A Senator informs me that Gen. Crowder disavows this recent performance in New York. That is what we should investigate. If Gen. Crowder, the Provost Marshal General, disavows it, let us find out who is responsible. That is what we want to investigate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me interrupt him, a gentleman in an article in the paper this morning says, "I am responsible," and he is in the Department of Justice. He says, "I am the man that did it," and Gen. Crowder said he was not responsible.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there have been many illustrations of the indignities heaped upon citizens in the enforcement of this law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not so much interested in the committee that makes the investigation as I am in the statement just made by the Senator from New Jersey with regard to the manner in which these people were taken into custody. Did the soldiers who stopped these men or boys know their names? What means had these people who arrested the alleged slackers for identifying them? Does the Senator mean to say that they just stopped anybody on the street?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Why, they stood on the street corners and grabbed men by the lapel of the coat, and said, "Here, show me your registration card." I saw three men apprehended in that way. They could not show their registration cards, and they were put in the trucks and sent to the armories.

Mr. CUMMINS. How did these soldiers know that the men had, or ought to have, registration cards?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They did not know.

Mr. CUMMINS. How did they know where they lived?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. All that they had was the statement of the men whom they apprehended, and in many cases they refused to believe them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I take it, then, that the report read yesterday by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is fully confirmed by the statement of the Senator from New Jersey; that is, that anyone who appeared to be between 21 and 31, at the pleasure of the soldier or officer, was stopped and evidence of his innocence was demanded. Is that the situation?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is exactly the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I may answer, perhaps officially, the question that is propounded by the Senator from Iowa. I received this morning through the mail—anonymously, of course, because no man would dare send it over his signature—what purports to be the instructions to operatives, headed "United States Department of Justice, New York," dated August 29, 1918. I do not vouch, of course, for the particular instrument or for its correctness, and in order that I may not be misunderstood let me repeat that it came to me through the mail from New York anonymously, and I give it to the Senator for what it is worth. It is printed, signed "Charles de Woody, division superintendent," and it begins:

> Every man who, judging from his appearance, had not reached his thirty-first birthday by June 5, 1917, or who, up to August 24, 1918, had attained the age of 21, should be requested to show his registration certificate. If he denies being within military age, he should be required by some affirmative or corroborative proof to establish his age, if in your judgment it is necessary.

Then follow various instructions, and, with the permission of the Senate, subsequently I will put it in the RECORD, in justice to those people who believe this was a legal and a moral and an ethical and a justifiable act.

On the last page appears the following:

> Beginning Tuesday morning, September 3, at 7 o'clock, the Department of Justice, at the direction of the Attorney General and with the approval of the Provost Marshal General, will institute a general canvass of New York City, The Bronx, Brooklyn, Queens, Richmond, Jersey City, and Newark, the canvass to continue day and night for an indefinite period, covering several days, until its discontinuance is ordered by this department.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can understand how it would be within reason for an officer or a soldier commissioned for that purpose to ask any one who appeared to be between 21 and 31 to exhibit his registration card; but, upon the mere failure to exhibit it, I can not understand very well how the soldier would regard himself authorized to put the person, at the point of a bayonet, into a prison van and send him to jail. To me that is the most astounding procedure I ever heard of in all my life. I hope that the investigation will furnish some explanation for it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I notice a somewhat peculiar expression in the circular from which the Senator from California has just read. The term "canvass" is used, the statement being that a canvass will be begun on the 3d day of September, and conducted indefinitely. Now, in the West we have another name for that sort of procedure, although we use it against animals and not men. We call it a round-up, and even there the mavericks are all cut out.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have no sympathy with the men who are skulking or who are slacking in this war, but the conscription act provides the machinery whereby they can be sorted out and apprehended. No one objects to the purposes of the War Department in their effort to get the men who are slacking. It is the methods that have been employed to which objection is made, and a mistake undoubtedly has been made.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. When I have finished I will yield to the Senator.

Undoubtedly a mistake has been made, but what we must guard against is a repetition of that mistake. This conscription act is not to be enforced by military authority, by press-gang methods. It is to be enforced through civil tribunals. That was the spirit of the law when it was enacted.

Mr. FALL. It is the word of the law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is the word of the law. I think, therefore, that a grave error has been made, and I think a full investigation should be made in justice to the people who have suffered.

Many illustrations have been presented to the Senate of the indignities that men have endured in the enforcement of this law by the military authorities in New York. I have one letter, addressed to the Senator from California, which is simply one instance, and it comes from a citizen of my State.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the Senator from New Jersey point out how they can get these slackers and deserters where they group up in a large city. Will the Senator please tell the Senate how they can accomplish it, and round them up, and get them, and separate them? By putting a writ in the hands of a sheriff and moseying around the streets of New York? Can you pick up the slackers in that way? Let the Senator describe how he would gather in the slackers if he had a chance.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will answer the Senator, if he has finished.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The unit of control by the local board is a county or a unit of 30,000 population, presided over by three members of a local district board, and in that district every citizen between this zone of years is compelled to register. There are means of identifying anyone who evades that registration. There is the poll book; there is the——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled, "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the resolution goes to the calendar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, any local board can identify anyone who escapes the draft within that limited unit, and they have done so. Gen. Crowder himself told me that he had rounded up some forty or fifty thousand slackers previous to the employment of these methods.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that if this is the only way to round up slackers we had better not try to round them up at all?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wanted to ask the Senator a question sometime ago. Of course, I could do it in my own time in my own way, but we are getting far away from the purpose of my interruption. I wanted to have the record straight if I could. At the time of the remarks of the Senator from Iowa he used an expression to the effect that the Senator from New Jersey said these men were put into trucks and carried to jail. I do not understand that anyone ever asserted that the men were carried to jail or that they were put in jail.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will furnish the Senator some evidence of that fact.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. For the Senator's information I will state that I myself saw men rounded up, packed into moving vans, jammed and packed into them, and taken to the police station.

Mr. FLETCHER. Taken to a police station or to an armory. I understand that they were taken to some armories, but they were not actually taken to jail.

Mr. CALDER. The letter I read stated that they were put in a corral.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would not say the men were put in jail simply because they were carried to a police station or an armory.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in answering the Senator from Florida, I believe that these men should be rounded up. I believe there is ample machinery now to round them up, and I have no sympathy with the slacker or skulker. I think they ought to begin right here in Washington and round them up and take some of the men out of the bomb-proof jobs down in the War Department and the other departments and make an investigation. I think every man who is liable to military service should go, but I do not approve of citizens of my State being submitted to outrage and indignity when they are not under this conscription act, and have their registration cards and have observed the law and complied with its conditions.

Mr. President, I have a letter here which will prove to the Senator from Florida that in at least one, and I think I can furnish you many other, instance men have been incarcerated. The letter is addressed to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and was handed to me previous to my rising to address the Senate. It is as follows:

GLEN ROCK, N. J., September 5, 1918.

Hon. HIRAM JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just read your remarks in the Senate to-day with regard to the draft round-up, and assure you that you are backed in your stand in this matter by many patriotic Americans in this section of the country.

My own experience as a result of the "slacker hunt" has been extremely unpleasant. On Tuesday evening, on my way from my business in New York to my home in New Jersey, I was stopped at the entrance to the Hudson Terminal Building by the military police and asked to produce my registration card. I was glad to comply with this request, but was informed that it was also necessary for me to produce my classification card. As I did not have this card in my possession I immediately found myself in the hands of an armed guard and was marched through the streets to the nearest police station.

The fact is that I had never received what I have since learned is a final classification card. Soon after I filed my questionnaire I received a postal card stating that I had been placed in class 4A, and I thought it unnecessary to carry this postal card with me. I have been engaged in newspaper work in the past and always read the newspapers very closely, but had failed to see any notice that it was necessary to carry anything more than the original registration card.

I endeavored to explain my position at the police station, but was immediately hurried into a place with a number of other intelligent looking men behind a set of bars. My next humiliation was to be placed in a military police automobile with nine other "suspects," which proceeded up crowded Broadway to the Sixty-ninth Regiment Armory at Twenty-sixth Street. Upon our entrance into the armory we were placed in a roped arena and given a slip to fill out. After progressing slowly for about an hour I reached the head of a line and had an inspector number my slip. I was then directed to another line, and in order to reach the head of this second line I was obliged to wait another hour and was then directed to the desk at which the examiners for the New Jersey men were located. I waited in a line at this point for over an hour and finally made my way up to the head of the line to ascertain the reason for the delay. Here I found three men at a desk who were so swamped with the slips which had been filled out in the armory that they had stopped taking any additional slips. From the time I arrived at this desk, shortly after 7 o'clock, until nearly 10 o'clock these men made no attempt to take the slips of the men waiting at this desk, who numbered several hundred. Some of the men complained that they had been there from 9 o'clock in the morning and were still there at 10 o'clock at night. The three men at the desk were absolutely incompetent, and even if they had been men of ability they could not take care of the situation, as they had only one telephone between them on which to call up all the New Jersey draft boards to check up the statements made on the slips.

After waiting until nearly 10 o'clock I made up my mind that I might as well stay for the night rather than remain packed in with several hundred other men of all description waiting for examination. I finally got in touch with an A. P. L. man and told him my position. This man was good enough to use his influence to obtain a pass for me from some one in authority, and in this way I was released from the armory after being detained for five hours. Otherwise I am sure that I would have been detained practically all night.

In the meantime my wife had been anxiously telephoning my friends endeavoring to ascertain why I had not come home at my usual hour. Naturally, none of my friends were aware of the cause for my delay in arriving home, and it was absolutely impossible for me to telephone.

It seems to me to be the easiest thing in the world to collect 50,000 men—

The statement has been made that the number was 14,000. It has been variously estimated at from thirty-five to sixty thousand men who were rounded up and there were only 1,200 men who were suspects. It is not proven that they were all slackers, and it took 60,000 innocent men who were apprehended and arrested to find that out.

It seems to me to be the easiest thing in the world to collect 50,000 men and to pack them into police stations and armories, but if anything of this kind is necessary there surely should be an organization capable of taking care of such a situation and to avoid having men locked up like criminals because they were unaware that it was necessary to carry their classification cards. I am sure that three-fourths of the men in the Sixty-ninth Regiment Armory were there because they could not produce their classification cards. Judging from what I saw, I would also be willing to wager that a large number of men sent away to camps as slackers are men who are actually registered and were not intelligent enough to make themselves understood.

Yours, respectfully,

J. WILLIAM SMALLWOOD.

This is from a reputable citizen of my State.

Mr. President, I have practically concluded. I simply want to say that, in justice to those citizens in my State who have complied with the law, I protest against this action by the authorities. I think a full investigation should be made. These men have not been merely inconvenienced, they have been humiliated, indignities have been heaped upon them, and it savors of the press gang and not of a civil tribunal, as was originally intended when the conscription act was passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as favoring the method pursued in this matter, but the criticism, it seems to me, should be addressed to the lack of efficacy by any such procedure. Apparently notice was given in advance that this sort of a step was to be taken, that men would be stopped on the streets and their cards requested, and all that sort of thing. Whether that notice was given in advance or not, evidently people knew about it very soon after the undertaking was started. If that is true, unquestionably every slacker was in a cellar; he was not on the street. He was not likely to be caught in that situation. It seems to me they could not have expected to have caught slackers in that way, because unquestionably if a man was a slacker he would stay off the street and seek a hiding place somewhere, and they would not be able to get the very people they were seeking. That would seem to me to be one criticism, if we are to judge by the statements that are furnished here as to what actually occurred.

But, without reference to that, the question would come where this sort of a resolution should go, or if it should be referred to a committee at all or not. It seems to me that it ought to be referred to a committee. If, as the Senator from Utah says, it merely calls for the furnishing of information as to who was responsible, if anyone, for the presence of sailors, and so forth, that is a matter we need not pass any resolution about, because it can be obtained over the telephone, or all you have to do is to write a letter to the Department of Justice to find out who is responsible for this occurrence. There is no need of any resolution to do that, and it is utterly futile, therefore, and useless to pass any such resolution, if that is all there is in this resolution, to ascertain merely who is responsible for it.

But I think there is something more in the resolution than that, although I question very much if under the resolution you could go into any careful or full investigation of the whole matter. I do not think the resolution is broad enough to authorize it, but still there is in the very beginning of it language of a general character which would clearly indicate that the purpose was not merely to ascertain who ordered it done, but to investigate and report upon such alleged occurrences. That is the language. Now, what does that mean? It means to investigate and to report upon these alleged occurrences. If you want to investigate the mere question as to whether these things actually occurred or not, that, of course, would be very easily disposed of, but if you investigate the whole subject of the invasion of the rights of citizens and the ground for that invasion, then you have a much broader field, and I doubt if the resolution is broad enough to cover it. But if it does cover it, it seems to me clearly, with all due respect to my good friend for whom I have the highest esteem, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it belongs to the Judiciary Committee. The Committee on Military Affairs have in charge all matters appertaining to the military forces. They have nothing to do with the question as to whether or not men who were not in the service, who had never been drafted, who were not called, who were not under the jurisdiction of the War Department at all, are having their rights interfered with or are being persecuted and ill-treated, as indicated by statements made here. If they have been, then the question is, What department is responsible for it and whether there was justification or law for it. That is a question for the Judiciary Committee to report upon. The whole thing has been conducted apparently by the Department of Justice. I think there can be no dispute about that. It has not been conducted by the military authorities at all. If so, then the Judiciary Committee is the proper committee to investigate and consider the question as to how far the Department of Justice has gone in this matter and what authority or agency it selected to carry out its program, and whether that was justified by law or emergency conditions.

It is a matter entirely for the Judiciary Committee to handle, it seems to me, and for that reason I think the motion to refer the resolution to the Judiciary Committee is a proper motion. It does not involve any insult or any offense, directly or indirectly, to the Military Affairs Committee; but, of course, there is no need to go into that. The resolution has gone to the calendar. I merely wanted to say this much in connection with it, so as to preserve the connection.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I was not surprised to learn this morning that the President of the United States had himself directed an investigation of the matter that has just been under discussion. In fact, I would have been very much surprised had I not learned that he had directed an investigation.

So far as the general question is concerned, I unhesitatingly say that, in my judgment, not only the law of the land, the rules and regulations of the President himself in connection with the draft, the registration and all other matters, and that the Constitution of the United States have been absolutely violated in the methods which have been pursued, and which I understand it is admitted have been pursued by the Department of Justice, if this round-up has been carried on by the Department of Justice. I could not concede for a moment that the President was aware of those methods, because they are at least violative of his rules and regulations adopted in connection with the draft. They are, of course, violative of the law, and they are distinctly violative of the Constitution of the United States. Until military rule is declared, the writ of habeas corpus suspended, and the method of doing those things is provided in the Constitution itself, the civil law remains the law of the land except where it is set aside by some dictatorship. We had an experience in this country when it was absolutely necessary to set aside the Constitution by usurpation of power by the administrative department. When such usurpation of power is necessary to save the Union, then we can excuse, of course, the use of those methods. We were faced with conditions as they existed in our statutes when we declared war. Some of us have proceeded from the moment of the declaration of war, or prior to that moment, upon the theory that we should give the President of the United States ample power under the Constitution of the United States so that he need not do as Lincoln was forced to do, usurp such power unconstitutionally. The Senate and the Congress of the United States have cooperated in giving to the President of the United States every power which he has requested, and in many instances have greatly broadened the powers which he has requested might be vested in him.

The Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, referred to a bill which he proposed setting aside the civil courts which have been provided with jurisdiction to try almost every imaginable character of case which might arise in the present emergency. He introduced his proposed law for the purpose of extending to the military courts, the military tribunals, the military authorities, jurisdiction in certain cases. The President of the United States unhesitatingly demanded through the public press that no such legislation should be enacted.

All Senators remember that the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of this great committee, rose here in the Senate and made the statement, and it appears in the RECORD, that in view of the fact that the President of the United States said that the civil courts were amply able to deal with every proposition involved, and that this military legislation was exactly what he had sought to avoid, he withdrew his proposed bill, leaving the law as it stands.

Under the draft act it is not the spirit of the act which prohibits such occurrences as took place in New York, but the words of the act itself. It is not the spirit of the regulations adopted under the provisions of the act by the President of the United States under the title of selective-service regulations which was avoided, but the wording of the regulations themselves was avoided.

I shall not undertake to occupy the time of the Senate to discuss this matter at any great length. The Constitution of the United States is still in force. The President of the United States has refused even to agree to any legislation setting it aside during this war. He has denounced any attempt to enact such legislation; and under the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated." Under the act known as the selective-service act, the jurisdiction for infractions of that act was distinctly conferred upon the several district courts. Under the selective-service regulations it is provided that the registration card after a person is registered should be preserved by him and should be shown on request or on demand to any member of a local or district board or to a police official. There is no penalty whatsoever for failure to show the registration card, except upon failure to do so the party may be taken before the local board. He may supply the loss of it by affidavits or otherwise. He may secure a duplication of his registration certificate upon proper application. In the event after he has registered that he refused to answer his questionnaire or refuses to report if he is called in class 1, he is called in the draft, or in the event he refuses to answer his questionnaire the procedure is prescribed by the rules and regulations adopted and promulgated by the President of the United States. It is not that any police officer or any member of a protective league proceed upon the streets to round-up the citizens and undertake to cull out from among those citizens those who have not answered their questionnaires, those who have not registered, and those who have not reported for duty, but the adjutant general of the State is charged with the duty of seeing that the questionnaires are answered and seeing that the report is made, and upon his action depends the future proceeding.

In the event the party still refuses, becomes entirely delinquent, does not report after the adjutant general notifies him to report, then he may be declared by the adjutant general under certain circumstances to be in the military service of the United States. Being so declared, he becomes subject to military law, and he can be arrested under military law as a deserter by a provost marshal's guard.

There are laws for all these matters. There are rules and regulations even with reference to war, and those rules and regulations must be followed.

The President, as I have said, I was confident would order an investigation of this matter, because no man entertaining and announcing the sentiments recently announced by the President of the United States in his statement with reference to mob violence, under date of August 22, 1918, calling upon the people to regard his advice, would have refrained for a moment when notice was brought to him of the charged acts occurring in New York from ordering the investigation which the President has ordered. I am going to quote from the President's words, because I commend it to those Senators who think that the law is set aside simply because we have adopted a selective-draft system in the United States for the purpose of constituting our armies. He said:

> Let us show our utter contempt for the things that have made this war hideous among the wars of history by showing how those who love liberty and right and justice and are willing to lay down their lives for them upon foreign fields stand ready also to illustrate to all mankind their loyalty to the things at home which they wish to see established everywhere as a blessing and protection to the peoples who have never known the privileges of liberty and self-government. I can never accept any man as a champion of liberty either for ourselves or for the world who does not reverence and obey the laws of our own beloved land, whose laws we ourselves have made. He has adopted the standards of the enemies of his country whom he affects to despise.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is entirely correct in his statement regarding the steps taken by the President. As I understand the question, the President knows what occurred here yesterday, and certainly the President knows from the newspapers what occurred in New York City, and the President has promptly acted.

Mr. FALL. I understand.

Mr. FLETCHER. The President has taken steps to investigate the matter. In that case, does the Senator think there is any need or occasion for this resolution?

Mr. FALL. I am doubtful about that. My own judgment is that the resolution might very well lie upon the table at the present time and not be referred or directly acted upon. That is simply my own personal opinion. My purpose in rising was simply to call attention to the law and to the fact that some of the Members of this body, with due respect to them, seem to me to be going so far beyond the law that the President will be out of their reach before they can get back to him. I believe the President is determined that the law shall be obeyed, and the law should be followed; and I have no doubt he will take steps to see that it is, and if it is, in my judgment, he will at least refuse to be connected with the arbitrary Russian-like acts which were perpetrated in New York City day before yesterday and the day before that, and which, I understand, have been by his orders stopped for the time being.

Mr. President, one more word. One of the Senators said here yesterday that such acts as this might have been committed in Germany. Never. Never in the history of Germany, until military rule was declared, could such acts as this have been committed. Never in the history of any civilized country under the heavens, except in the history of Russia, could such acts have been committed. Exactly the commission of such acts as this have brought about the present condition of absolute anarchy, murder, and lawlessness in that great country; and it is against such conditions that the President of the United States was appealing on August 22 when he asked the people of the United States to be bound by the law.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, during the time in which the unfinished business was before the Senate yesterday afternoon, the debate taking a wide range, the Federal Trade Commission and its reports came in for a very severe arraignment. It was my misfortune to be absent during that discussion, but I have since read the RECORD, and have been very much interested in the debate. It had not been my purpose to say anything in regard to these reports until such time as legislation was offered purporting to deal with the condition of affairs which the reports reveal; but, in view of the debate and the things that have been said, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I express some views in regard to those reports. I feel somewhat under obligations to do so, although it also represents my wishes and desires, because of the fact that the resolution which called for one of these reports was offered by myself.

Mr. President, I was not an advocate of the creation of the Federal Trade Commission. As will be recalled, particularly by my friend from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who was of a different opinion, I was very much opposed to the creation of that commission—that is, I was opposed to creating it with the powers given. I felt at the time that it was being given a latitudinous power; that there was practically no limitation upon its power; that the legislation was vesting in a few men a discretionary power wholly at war with our theory of government. I have not changed my opinion as to the power which was granted to the commission. I doubt very much whether or not there is any limitation upon it within certain most general lines. During the debate upon the subject I took occasion to say—quoting from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of June 29, 1914—> are given all kinds of power. The division of power which inheres in our form of government is practically ignored when we reach the commissions, and they exercise almost every conceivable kind of power which a government possesses.

> They—

That is, commissions—

Again, I said:

> Let us go now to the bill itself and see in regard to section 5: "That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared to be unlawful."
>
> To my mind this furnishes no standard whatever, and, in so far as it furnishes no standard, it favors the lawless and embarrasses the honest. I can not conceive of a term which is more elastic in the mind of the business world than the phrase "unfair competition."
> Legitimate business and honest industry have a just complaint against the Government. We are piling statute upon statute and rule of conduct upon rule of conduct, while we enforce and execute our laws with no regard for consistency and often with a keen regard for political exigencies and with notorious favoritism. Thus honest and legitimate business is enmeshed in a wilderness of laws, made the plaything and the puppet of politics, while dishonest and illegitimate business—monopoly—in its brazen impudence purchases favors by campaign contributions and thus "easily breaks through." We have in this country arrived at or seem to be closely approaching the time when the organizers and creators of monopoly are to lay down the rules and fix the regulations by which they are to carry on business.
> The vast majority of the business men of this country are willing and anxious to do business on an honest basis. They believe in honesty as the best policy as a business proposition. They will obey any law that rests in feasibility and reason—any law that business can obey and exist. The laws which we pass ought to take this fact into consideration. But we do not do so. We legislate upon the theory that business is morally bankrupt. * * * We seem to be reaching out with commissions and inquisitorial bodies to oversee, superintend, and police every business man and every line of business in the United States. We have a penchant just now to see how our business will look when incased in the strait-jacket of a bureaucratic system.

One of the charges, Mr. President, which is made against the Federal Trade Commission at this time is that it is usurping power; that it is exercising power which does not belong to it. In my opnion, the commission has acted wholly within powers given to it by Congress. Indeed, it would be very difficult, performing this kind of service, to get outside of the power granted to it by Congress; and, while there may be a difference of opinion as to the judgment exercised by the commission with reference to the performance of a single or particular duty, that the commission has operated and acted clearly within the jurisdiction given it by the law, in my opinion, there can be no doubt.

I call the attention of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States to the fact that at the time this commission was being created and at the time these powers were being granted the powers of which they now complain were clearly pointed out; these possible conditions were foreshadowed; and yet my recollection is that some who are prominent members of that body were among those who insisted upon the creation of the commission and on the granting of these powers.

Turning to the act which created this commission, I find this provision:

> That unfair methods of competition in commerce are hereby declared unlawful. The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, and corporations, except banks and common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Could any more uncircumscribed and unlimited power be bestowed upon a body of men than to give them jurisdiction and surveillance of the business world, to the end that they might "prevent them from using unfair methods of competition in commerce"? Here is combined executive and quasi legislative and judicial powers, and the jurisdiction given is that of keeping the commerce of the whole United States within the limits of fair competition, and yet we are told this commission is usurping its power. Further, the statute says:

To gather and compile information concerning and to investigate from time to time the organization, business conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce excepting banks and common carriers and its relation to other corporations and to individual associations.

So we might read many other sections. The most answerable charge which could be brought against this commission is that it has usurped its power. When we think upon the power that has been granted it and then reflect upon the power that it has assumed to exercise we are rather moved by its modesty than upset by its usurpation.

Mr. President, these powers have now been exercised to uncover and reveal a condition of affairs of a most serious nature. But these conditions can not be disposed of by going back and charging that it is a usurpation of power to do precisely what the commission is authorized under the statutes to do in case it is called upon to act. There has been no usurpation of power, Mr. President. It is not that which has caused the difficulty. The difficulty arises out of the kind of facts which have been revealed; of the conditions which have been made known with reference to certain business institutions in this country.

As I said a moment ago, while I was not an advocate of the creation of the commission, I now raise my voice in its defense for the courageous discharge of a duty. If these facts reported are untrue or grounded in error let us know it, but it is no answer to the facts to charge a usurpation of power.

Mr. President, during all the debates here by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and others, there has not been a single refutation as to the facts which this commission has disclosed. It has been said that some of them have left their place of duty and gone into the political campaign in the different States to seek other offices. It has been said they are merely playing politics. That kind of criticism has been lodged against the commission. With it I have nothing to do, and about it I care nothing; but what I want to know of those who criticize the report of the commission is, Have you any facts which confute the facts which they present? Has the condition of affairs which they reveal no real existence; is it imaginary upon the part of the commission? If it is not, it reveals a condition of affairs which may well engage the attention of this legislative body in a different way from that of criticism. Abuse and personal attacks do not remedy the conditions disclosed. Indeed it is a confession that the facts are correctly stated and that no remedy is wanted.

Mr. President, it should not be forgotten that these reports were called for by the Senate of the United States in one instance and the President of the United States in the other instance. The Chamber of Commerce say that they have usurped their powers of publicity. They made a report in response to the resolution which was passed by this body, and it was made public and carried to the country. They made a report in response to a request from the President, and it was published and made known to the country. What usurpation of the power of publicity is to be found in that transaction? Were not these facts, Mr. President, facts which it was well for the country to know if they are true? And as yet they have not been confuted. Is there any time too soon for the people to be informed of the condition of affairs which the report reveals? What possible harm can come from the people being put in possession of these facts? I do not understand that the commission itself has undertaken voluntarily to lay before the public anything not called for either by the statute itself or by some resolution or some request from an official entitled to have the facts. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if the facts revealed by the commission themselves are disputed as being true? And, secondly, were they not presented in response to request resolutions?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I shall do so in just a moment.

Mr. President, it is a characteristic which is not to be criticized that a Senator naturally defends, if it is possible to do so, those things which have their origin in his own State. Perhaps that is a proper practice because they should be heard, but in making a defense of those who happen to be our constituents we ought to be prepared to submit facts which show that the charges laid against them have no foundation in truth. Now I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I asked the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] the same question yesterday that the Senator from Idaho now asks him; whether or not the facts were true, and as I understood, the Senator from Illinois stated that they were not wholly true. I noticed that the Senator from Illinois did not respond to the Senator's query, and I was wondering whether or not he heard it.

Mr. BORAH. Well, as to that, I do not know.

It is barely possible that in making out long and extended reports there are some facts in such reports, as interpreted by the Senator from North Dakota, which are not wholly true; and there may be details about which there could be justifiable controversy—indeed, I am not concluding anybody by this report, but I do say the report can not be answered by mere abuse.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want the Senator from Idaho to understand that I am not questioning the reports at all.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that. Mr. President, is it denied—and if so, by whom—that these five great meat concerns dominate the meat market of the United States?

Mr. GORE. And very largely the meat market of the world.

Mr. BORAH. Is it denied—and if so, by whom—that these five great concerns, through their attorneys and agents, sit down at the table regularly, either weekly or oftener or less frequently, and agree among themselves as to prices of the products which they sell the people? That, Mr. President, can be sustained by the proof which is found in the record. That being true, the basis of the charge which is laid here by the Federal Trade Commission has its firm foundation in the practically undisputed facts.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it not a fact, also, that these different packers have so arranged their matters that no two of them have refrigerating stores or distribution stores in the same town?

Mr. BORAH. I have seen that statement made, but I am not able to say that the evidence bears out that particular proposition, for I have not examined the evidence with reference to that matter. That, however, is a current report.

Mr. President, let me call your attention to just one little item. Sometimes we can get a view of a tremendous transaction by just turning the spotlight upon a specific concrete proposition. There is not a western Senator here who does not know that during the last year it has been practically impossible for the farmer or the stock raiser when he kills an animal or finds an animal dead upon the range and skins it to sell the hide. Hides are practically without any market value whatever. Every one of us has letters upon his desk, I presume, at least I have a number of them, giving particulars where men have gone to the local markets and offered hides for sale and have been told that there was no market for them; that they can either take the amount offered, which is very small, or can keep the hide and take it home. Of course, a man who has a hide to sell must necessarily part with it at the price which is fixed. Who fixes that price? Does the local dealer fix it? He is the representative or the agent of the five great packers which are in complete control of the situation from the time the calf is born until it is sold as meat. They dominate not only the market where they buy but the market where we buy; they are the complete dictators of the food supply of this character not only throughout the United States but in a very large measure throughout the whole of America. I admire the courage of that class of officials who will reveal that condition of affairs, which has existed in this country for 28 years at least without any interception of its progress and its program. At this point I desire to read a brief extract from the recent report of the Federal Trade Commission:

As an indication of earnings of the big packers in the selling branch of their leather business, the following is quoted from a letter of January 17, 1917, by the Eastern Leather Co., an Armour selling subsidiary, to Mr. F. W. Croll, of Armour & Co.:

"We are inclosing our check on the National City Bank, New York City, payable to Mr. J. Ogden Armour, for $915,787, same being a dividend of 53 per cent on the 17,279 shares of common stock standing in his name. In addition to this, and in accordance with our conversation when in Chicago, we have set aside as a surplus $250,000, which represents 10 per cent on the common stock.

"We are also inclosing a check on the National City Bank for $202,145.62, payable to Mr. Armour, this being the balance due on 6,020 shares of common stock held for employees."

Mr. President, this institution dealing in hides, for which there was no market, so far as the farmer or stock raiser was concerned, was itself making 53 per cent. That institution is one of the subsidiary or related institutions of Armour & Co. So, sir, trace the ramifications of these institutions either forward or backward, as you will, and you will find that they are completely in control of the situation; that they not only control the market where the cattle are sold but the market where the people buy the product to eat upon their tables.

Mr. President, does anyone contend that these figures with reference to the profits of these institutions are untrue? That is a question which I submit to this body; not whether Mr. Harris leaves the commission and goes to seek a senatorial office, but have they revealed a state of facts momentous in their significance and the evil of which no man can portray if the condition is permitted to continue?

Mr. President, there has been wide, unconscionable, thoroughly extended, universal profiteering in this country ever since the war began. The report put upon our tables a few weeks ago by the Secretary of the Treasury and the report of the Federal Trade Commission, both to the President and to the Senate, have disclosed profits all the way from 15 to 350 per cent. Not all of these are profiteers, but it is important for many reasons to have all the facts. Now, sir, when these officials have done their duty and revealed the facts as they exist, instead of hitting them on the head and discouraging their service in making known the facts as they are, we had better occupy our time in passing legislation which will deal with the situation and deal with it effectually.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, he has referred to the startling disclosures in the reports sent in by the Secretary of the Treasury. My attention was called the other day to a statement in one of the Washington papers to the effect that already experts of the Treasury Department had discovered $5,000,000 of taxes due to the Government from 265 coal companies, which amount the companies had neglected to report; that there were 2,500 of these coal companies; and that it was estimated that the Government would uncover about $50,000,000 of taxes which the companies ought to have returned, but did not return.

Mr. BORAH. When the returns come in I presume very little will be said about the returns, but a vast amount will be said about the mistreatment of business.

Mr. President, no sane man, no man who has any regard for the stability of our institutions and the permanency of our Government, wants to see any honest, legitimate business assailed or embarrassed. When that is done it not only interferes with business, but it interferes with labor, and it interferes with the morale of the country. The business man is entitled to the full protection of the law and the full presumption of innocence of wrong doing until the contrary is shown beyond question; but I have noticed, Mr. President, in this Chamber for many a day that if there is any one thing which will arouse interest and start a propaganda such as is seldom seen for any other cause it is when just such conditions as are revealed by this report are made known to the public. No one ought to attack legitimate business; no one should complain of fair profits. But facts never disturb legitimate business, and facts do not hurt fair profits. I ask you again, Do you deny these facts? If so, let us have your case.

I wish, therefore, to say in conclusion, in connection with the attacks made by the chamber of commerce and made by the different institutions engaged in this propaganda, that so far as my investigation goes the figures produced by the Federal Trade Commission are sustained by the hearings. Every other conceivable proposition—usurpation of power, undue publicity, political activity, and every other conceivable thing wholly disconnected with the actual matter about which we are concerned—has been and is being discussed, the Federal Trade Commission is being pilloried from one end of the country to the other, and the people may come to the conclusion that they are a band of incompetent men engaged purely in demagogic propaganda, losing sight of the fact that all this time no figure, no fact as stated by the commission, is controverted by those who assail it.

Mr. President, we will have to take hold of this matter by legislation and deal with it in a proper way and at the proper time. At that time undoubtedly we will go into the details of these facts and figures. At this time, I only want to protest against the method by which it is sought to disparage and discredit these reports.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. As I have followed the very interesting address of the Senator, I gather the idea that the organizations to which he refers have been violating the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law; that they have entered into conspiracies either to restrict trade or to deal unfairly with the consuming public. Why the necessity of additional legislation? It would seem, if their acts are as malevolent as the Senator suggests, that there is ample law now to bring them into the courts, to dissolve the illegal combination, and to pronounce such judgment as would do justice in the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps, Mr. President, when the concrete legislation is presented the Senator may be able to convince me that no further legislation is necessary. I agree with him perfectly that certain things could be done now under the present law which upon the state of facts disclosed ought to be done; but, speaking for myself, I have somewhat lost faith in the power of this Government to regulate a monopoly. We are drifting away from the proposition of destroying a monopoly and have accepted almost entirely the principle of trying to regulate monopoly. I think you can no more regulate a monopoly than you can regulate a cancer. Before very long those who are to be regulated get possession politically of the regulators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to make a suggestion. I was out during a part of his address and he may have touched upon the point to which I am about to refer, but it bears directly upon what the Senator has said. The Senator has said in reply to the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the stockyards, as distinguished from the packers, of course, are independent corporations. The theory of the stockyards is that it is a public market place; but, as a matter of fact, it is owned in every instance, I believe without exception at the packing centers, by the packing houses.

That means that the public market place, which ought to be open on equal terms to everybody, is owned by practically the only men and the only corporations who, in the very nature of things, do practically all the buying on that market. It does not take very much of a stretch of the imagination to see that when a public market place is thus owned, of course, it will become one of the utilities of the men who own it, absolutely contradicting the theory upon which it exists.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. KING. I do not want the Senator to deduce from any statement which I made that I was opposed to any further legislation. I express no opinion as to the necessity or lack of necessity of additional legislation, or whether there is existing law sufficiently broad to cover the evils to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand that the Senator was opposing further legislation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska what he means by a public market privately owned?

Mr. NORRIS. The stockyards are a pretty good illustration of a concrete case. The stockyards are a place where the seller and the buyer are supposed to come together. They are owned by the packers, and they get immense revenues from them, as a matter of fact. They make all the rules and the regulations, with the seller—the producer of the stock—having nothing to say about it. In my judgment, they ought to be publicly owned, publicly controlled, publicly managed, the same as any other market place, for the benefit of the public, without the view of producing a profit to anybody.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I can understand that if they were publicly owned and publicly controlled and publicly managed they would be public markets; but if they are privately owned and privately managed I fail to see how they are public markets, any more than a man's store is a public market.

Mr. NORRIS. As a matter of fact, in practice, they are not public, open markets. As a matter of theory, they are. In my State the legislature has declared them to be common carriers.

Mr. BORAH. They are public in the sense that everyone is supposed to be admitted to them.

Mr. NORRIS. They ought to be. That is the theory of it.

Mr. BORAH. They are supposed to be.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. That is not the practice, however.

Mr. BORAH. There are certain markets, like Chicago, Omaha, and those places, which every man who sells stock must use.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be, Mr. President. I do not think the Senator's designation of a privately-owned institution as a public thing is quite warranted. Of course, the railroads have been privately owned and they have been held to be charged with a public use, but they are not public in the sense that they are owned by the public. That is all I meant.

Mr. NORRIS. I said that the theory was that they were public market places. As a matter of fact, they are owned in every case by corporations. The public does not always distinguish between the packers and the stockyards, but the stockyards are an entirely separate corporation. In all the cases with which I am familiar the capital stock is made mostly of water and they pay large dividends on money that never was invested, as a matter of fact. They are capitalized away beyond reason. I have not the figures before me now, but in the case of the stockyards at South Omaha—one of the largest in the world—I am able to get them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think it would not be out of place for me to say that in a conversation the other day with Mr. Swift, one of the representatives of a large packing house, he was very frank to concede that these markets were in their nature public markets, public utilities, and he further said that in his opinion they must in all probability come under the ownership and control of the Government; that the manner in which the business was carried on made it necessary for them to be open, through the permission of the public, to all who wished to use them, upon equal terms.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Was he speaking with reference to war times or permanently?

Mr. BORAH. Permanently.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have desired for some time to make some observations upon the report of the Federal Trade Commission, to which reference has just been made by the Senator from Idaho, and this seems to me to be the best opportunity, probably, that I will be able to secure. It is especially with regard to the suggestion by Senators that there is need for further legislation upon the subject.

I was an advocate of the creation of the Federal Trade Commission—a very earnest, sincere advocate of establishing that new function in the Government. I think it has fully vindicated its usefulness and value to the people of the United States. I can not imagine a claim more unfounded than that in this particular instance it has passed beyond the authority granted to it by the statute. Without saying anything with regard to the truth or the falsity of the representations it has made, to assert that it had not the authority to make the investigation and submit its report both to the President and to Congress is simply to fly in the face of the plain, clear language of the statute. I do not intend to waste any time upon that view, nor do I intend to enter upon the subject of whether these things are true or false.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. We know without this report that a great many of them are true, because these facts have become a part of the common knowledge of the whole country, and we accept them as implicitly as we accept any other thing with which the whole world has become thoroughly acquainted.

I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply rose to observe that if this report of the Federal Trade Commission had been favorable to the packers, they never would have questioned its authority.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that is true. I think the commission has performed a very valuable work, not alone in this matter, but in a great many other subjects which have been of vital importance to the people of this country.

I want, however, to call the attention of the Senate to the recommendations made by the commission. I do not know whether the Senate generally has studied the matter sufficiently to have reached a conclusion upon it. If not, it will be interesting to note that with the exception of one recommendation—and that may be within the power of the President—the President has the power at this moment, at any moment, to put into execution every recommendation made by the commission. As a permanent adjustment in times of peace it may be that further legislation will be necessary; but for this time, this emergency, for the protection of the people of this country against the propensities of the packers, there is full and ample power in the law as it is now to enforce every recommendation made by the commission, with possibly one exception, which is not nearly so important or material as the remainder of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator of the opinion that under existing law the Government could take over the stock yards?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly. There is no more doubt about it than that it could take over the railroads.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that I entertained the same opinion, and do yet; but I introduced in the Senate a resolution asking the Director General of Railroads to answer that question, and it has been answered by his assistant officially to the Senate, and in the answer the opinion is expressed that he does not have authority under the law to take possession of them.

Mr. CUMMINS. The opinion is in error, no matter who rendered it.

The commission recommends:

1. That the Government acquire, through the railroad administration, all rolling stock used for the transportation of meat animals, and that such ownership be declared a Government monopoly.

Can it be doubted that under the railway act which we passed, I think in April, enlarging the power of the President with regard to the possession and operation of railway systems, that it is now within his power to take over the rolling stock which is being used constantly in the transportation of meat animals? This rolling stock is just as much a part of the systems of transportation which are established in this country as the engines or the passenger cars or the ordinary freight cars. There is no difference whatever, and I can not understand why, with this remedy, if the President thinks it is a remedy—and I am not entering upon that question at this time—but if the President thinks that the report is well founded and that the recommendation ought to be adopted, I can not understand why all the rolling stock used in the transportation of meat animals in this country is not already in the possession of the Government and subject to our absolute and unrestricted regulation and control.

The second recommendation is the one to which reference was made by the Senator from Nebraska. It is:

2. That the Government acquire, through the Railroad Administration, the principal and necessary stockyards of the country, to be treated as freight depots and to be operated under such conditions as will insure open, competitive markets, with uniform scale of charges for all services performed, and the acquisition or establishment of such additional yards from time to time as the future development of live-stock production in the United States may require. This to include customary adjuncts of stockyards.

What are stockyards? They are simply the freight depots for live stock. It is not practicable to unload live stock and place it in confinement within narrow walls. Live stock must be unloaded in yards, and yards are for live stock precisely what an elevator is for grain—neither more nor less. It matters not to me what any other person may think with regard to the power of the Administration to take over stockyards; it is unreasonable to hold that these freight yards for live stock are not as fully within the power of the administration as are inclosures which are intended to preserve and protect the dead freight that may be unloaded at that particular terminal.

The third recommendation is:

3. That the Government acquire, through the Railroad Administration, all privately owned refrigerator cars and all necessary equipment for their proper operation, and that such ownership be declared a Government monopoly.

Mr. President, the Government has already taken over, to all intents and purposes, the privately owned refrigerator cars.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. They constitute a portion of the equipment of the several railroads, and they are in constant use as a part of the Government-controlled and Government-operated property. If there is any additional or technical act necessary to vest completely in the control of the Government these cars, no one will question the power of the Government to deal with them precisely as it has dealt with cars which belong to railroad companies. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the interruption which I desired to make pertains to the question I submitted to the Senator some time ago regarding the authority of the Government, under existing law, to take over the stockyards. I may say that I agree with the Senator on the authority; but I understood from various sources that it was questioned by the legal advisers of the Director General of Railroads, and so I introduced a resolution, and among other things asked that question. It was passed by the Senate; and, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to read that part of the answer which answers that question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. This letter is signed by Mr. Walker D. Hines, Acting Director General. This is only part of the letter. There were several other questions involved in the resolution; but in answer to the one the Senator has been discussing, Mr. Hines uses the following language:

It is believed that the Director General of Railroads has not authority under existing laws to take over stockyards. The authority under which the roads were taken over by the President is derived from the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," and the power is limited to systems of transportation or parts thereof. The Federal control act, approved March 21, 1918, does not, it is believed, enlarge this power.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska give me a reference to that reply?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the answer of the Director General of Railroads in response to a resolution passed by the Senate, and it is found printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 26, 1918, on page 8285.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, Mr. Hines is a very eminent lawyer as well as an administrator. His long connection with the railways of the United States has undoubtedly given him certain tendencies which I would not expect him to overcome immediately upon his assumption of a public office. All I can say is that when we consider what the Government has done in taking over property connected with the railway systems of the United States I can not accept his very brief and unsatisfactory discussion of the matter. The stockyards in Chicago are just as much a part of a system of transportation as are the freight depots in Chicago or the freight stations in Chicago. As I remarked before, they are an essential element in the transportation of live stock; and Mr. Hines might as well say to me that he could not take over a single elevator along the line of the railway, if it were not owned by the railway itself, as to say to me that he could not take over the stockyards in Chicago because they do not constitute a part of a system of railway. They do constitute a part of a system of transportation, and it can not be declared with any reasonable assurance that the Government is powerless in that respect. The reason that opinion is given, in my judgment, is because the Government does not want to take over the Chicago stockyards.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that section 12 of the food-control act—a copy of which I have sent to the Senator's desk, and it is lying there now—in express terms gives the President the power to requisition factories and packing houses or any part thereof.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to remark upon that a little later.

Mr. GORE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was speaking now simply of the railway act; but I might as well complete the subject and read a part of the food-control statute into the RECORD now:

That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, is not essential for the national security or defense, the same shall be restored to the person entitled to the possession thereof.

The fourth recommendation is the only one about which I have any doubt whatever. It is:

4. That the Federal Government acquire such of the branch houses, cold-storage plants, and warehouses as are necessary to provide facilities for the competitive marketing and storage of food products in the principal centers of distribution and consumption, the same to be operated by the Government as public markets and storage places under such conditions as will afford an outlet for all manufacturers and handlers of food products on equal terms. Supplementing the marketing and storage facilities thus acquired, the Federal Government establish through the Railroad Administration, at the terminals of all principal points of distribution and consumption, central wholesale markets and storage plants, with facilities open to all upon payment of just and fair charges.

It may be that we have not specifically conferred upon the Government the power to open a market for the purpose of buying and selling meat products. I am not at all sure but that we have, because we have done so many things in this direction that I am rather inclined to think that the power given is adequate. But if we have not, this is not the important part of the recommendation of the Federal Trade Commission. What the commission really desires is that the Government shall take possession of the stockyards, equivalent to warehouses, at the various terminal points throughout the country, so that one who desires to enter into the packing business in competition with the houses which have already been established can invest his capital and construct his plant with the assurance that he will have a fair and even chance in the buying market, namely, the stockyards. The further purpose is to regulate the stockyards so that a reasonable price to the producer may be assured—I may say, a reasonable price to the buyer as well—but the principal purpose is to open the way for fair and reasonable competition by giving access to the only places at which cattle, hogs, and sheep can be bought.

I should like to know why the administration, in view of this report, if my interpretation of the law be correct, has not proceeded along the lines of relief suggested by the commission. I do not believe that the people of this country are very much interested now in monopolies as such. I do not believe they are very much interested in the enforcement of the antitrust law as such. The thing in which our people are interested, so far as the packers are concerned, is this: First, that the packers ought to pay a fair and reasonable price for the live animals they buy; second, that they ought to sell their products at a fair and reasonable price. That means cost with a fair profit added. So far as these things are concerned, I do not think Congress can be criticized for not enacting further legislation, inasmuch as ample, adequate power to accomplish these purposes is already in the hands of the Executive of the United States.

I am not complaining, I am not criticizing, because sufficient time may not have elapsed to enable the Executive to formulate and put into operation these corrective measures.

I am only saying that the people ought not to fall into the belief that these wrongs are being committed, because Congress fails to perform its duty. I insist that there is comprehensive authority now to bring about that change in the business to which we have alluded and apply the remedy which the Federal Trade Commission has proposed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I put the Senator a concrete question? The Senator holds that there is authority under the existing law to take over these monopolies and prevent these abuses that have been pointed out by the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is just the point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of it whatever.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator—and he has given the subject investigation and study—what is the purpose of the chamber of commerce in its protest or demand for the abolition of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not discussed that phase of the subject, but I assume that it is because the chamber of commerce believes the Federal Trade Commission ought to be abolished.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I dare say that is true; but I ask the Senator if there is any crime the commission has committed that would deserve its abolition, except that of revealing the crimes of the manufacturers and packers and other profiteers who have taken advantage of the war?

Mr. CUMMINS. It may have committed errors from time to time in the method of its procedure, but I repeat what I said in the beginning, that I believe the Federal Trade Commission has been honest, diligent, and effective.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the Senator. I think it is entitled to the thanks of Congress and of the American people for the exposures that have been made by it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my whole purpose has been to show that the administration has the authority for carrying into effect substantially the recommendations of the Trade Commission, and I sincerely hope, if the President upon examining the report finds it to be well founded and these recommendations wise, that he will speedily put these remedies at the disposal of the American people.

Mr. KING obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. By way of further answering the question of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] I wish to say that there is an organization in this country known as the American Seed Manufacturers' Association. It was organized in 1909. Mr. J. H. Genung was chosen as its first president, I am informed. I have a communication in my hand which states that Mr. Genung now represents that association in the United States Chamber of Commerce. On the board of directors of the Food Manufacturers' Association are representatives of Armour & Co., Swift & Co., the Quaker Oats Co., which is a subsidiary of Armour & Co., and so on. I thought possibly that might indicate some ligament of connection.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That explanation is ample. What I desired to find was the motive behind the recommendation of the Chamber of Commerce to abolish the Federal Trade Commission. It was not because of its lack of vigilance in the performance of its duty but because it performed it too well.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to page 6 of the bill under consideration. In line 10 of the bill I find the words "home-demonstration work, $803,385." In line 8 I find the words "home-demonstration work, $1,327,400." In other words, there are two items covering the same matter. I move to strike out the words "home-demonstration work, $1,327,400" found in line 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 8, strike out the words "home-demonstration work, $1,327,400."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that these two items cover home-demonstration work in different sections of the United States. I understood the Senator to state that both these items were devoted to the same purpose, and I think he conveyed the idea that it was for the country generally, but the first item relates to home-demonstration work in the Northern and Western States and the second item to work in the Southern States. They are distinct items.

Mr. KING. We find in this same section a number of items. For instance, general administration of extension work, $35,000; home-economics work, $25,000; extension work in the Northern and Western States, $134,200; county agent work, $1,893,000; boys' and girls' club work, $382,900; home-demonstration work, $1,327,400; extension work in the Southern States, $90,000; county-agent work, $1,333,815; boys' club work, $75,300; home-demonstration work, again, $803,385; in all, $6,100,000, notwithstanding the general appropriation bill passed a few weeks since carries more than $1,000,000 for these same activities.

I felt that there must be some mistake when I find in the bill in one line these words:

Home-demonstration work, $1,327,400.

And two lines lower down—

Home-demonstration work, $803,385.

Mr. STERLING. Does not the Senator see now, on rereading the paragraph, that the one pertains to home-demonstration work in the Northern and Western States and the other to home-demonstration work in the Southern States?

Mr. KING. No, Mr. President.

Mr. STERLING. They are two separate items pertaining to different sections of the Union.

Mr. KING. I am not acute enough to see that or to see the geographical aspects of these items. There is nothing to characterize either of the appropriations, nothing to indicate the place where the appropriation is to be expended. Of course, one can draw upon his imagination. One with as much reason might contend that the first item refers to Alaska and the second one to the Philippine Archipelago as to state that the former refers to the Northern States and the latter to the Southern Sates. There is absolutely nothing in the context indicative of the geographical location in which the expenditures are to be made.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will pardon me, I will read the language:

Extension work in the Northern and Western States, $134,200.
County-agent work, $1,893,000.
Boys' and girls' club work, $382,900.
Home-demonstration work, $1,327,400.

That is for the Northern and Western States. Now comes a repetition of the same items, but differing in amount, applying to the Southern States:

Extension work in the Southern States, $90,000.
County-agent work—

The words "Southern States" are not repeated, but in the Southern States—

$1,333,815.
Boys' club work—

In the Southern States—

$75,300.
Home-demonstration work—

In the Southern States—

$803,385.

Mr. KING. Of course, one may supply by imagination or interest that which is not stated in the bill. There is no heading, punctuation, nor arrangement of the items to indicate that the construction which the Senator contends for is the correct one or the one which those who may administer the bill, if it becomes a law, will place upon it.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will turn to the Book of Estimates, he will find the division made there for demonstration work for the Northern and Western States and home demonstration work for the Southern States, and so on with the other items.

Mr. KING. The Book of Estimates is not a part of this bill. There is no doubt in the world but what if this appropriation should be made in the form in which it is reported in the bill both those items could be used in one section of the United States or in a hundred different places.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator's real objection is not to the fact that there is any ambiguity about the bill, but it is an objection to the appropriation itself. I think there is no question but that the Agricultural Department will administer this appropriation according to what is the fair intendment of the bill, namely, so much for home demonstration work and the other activities in these two different sections of the Union.

Mr. KING. The Senator from South Dakota is not warranted in attempting to determine the motive which prompts the motion which I have submitted. I do concede, however, that I am opposed to some of these items, first, because they are unnecessary and needlessly extravagant, and second, because we have not the man power now with which we can supply the thousands of men who will be required if this bill shall be enacted into law to carry it into execution. As I have stated, Congress has liberally provided in another bill for the work which it is claimed this measure will accomplish. I think this bill ought in greater propriety to be labeled "a bill to enable a large number of men to escape military service, and to furnish jobs for thousands of men whose services are of vital importance in other fields of industry."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not familiar with this subject, and I ask for information, What class of activities is comprehended by the term "home-demonstration work"?

Mr. KING. I understand from the statements which have been made, notably the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], that a number of ladies in his State, at a large per diem compensation, went around showing the housewives how to make cottage cheese. These high-salaried ladies failed to take note of the fact that the farmers' wives were well skilled in this art. I have no doubt that there have been and are now a large number of young men, and women for that matter, visiting the homes of the people of the United States carrying out what this bill calls "home demonstration work." The theory of the Agricultural Department experts and clerks and bureaus is that the farmers have grown so infantile that they must have somebody from Washington visit their homes and teach them how to cook and how to farm and perform the usual duties of domestic activity. As suggested by a Senator near me, sotto voce, Washington must teach how to wash the faces of the people. We are so lacking in intelligence and in initiative—this people who have builded Commonwealths and made this the foremost nation of the world—are now so ignorant, so incapable of handling their own affairs, so lacking in initiative and ordinary common sense, that we must have a swarm of men and women go out from Washington to instruct the people in the everyday duties of life. This is paternalism gone mad. This is the apotheosis of bureaucracy. What a benevolent despotism some persons are seeking to establish!

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was this demonstration work requested by people who feel the need of it?

Mr. KING. I think when we passed the special Agricultural appropriation bill a year ago, carrying a very large sum, the Department of Agriculture immediately sent into various States a large number of men and women for the purpose, it was alleged, of instructing the people in the common everyday affairs of life. I have no doubt that some of the people welcomed these peripatetic peddlers of knowledge and disseminators of information only known to the Agricultural Department, and I have no doubt that there are a number of people who will again welcome a repetition of the visits of these or other individuals sent for a like purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is satisfied that this is necessary as a war measure?

Mr. KING. The Department of Agriculture says it is essential to win the war, and of course if the department says anything, or a bureau or a clerk says anything, that establishes its orthodox character and invests the statement with a sanctity that no Senator should question. Senators are constantly asserting that we have ceased to legislate and merely register departmental decrees. We take the word of some department under the bureaucracy that has grown up in this Republic. Senators rise here from day to day, especially upon the Republican side, and denounce certain of the executive departments because of their alleged usurpations, and because of their manifest purpose, it is claimed, to prescribe legislation and govern the Nation. Republican Senators have frequently charged that the executive branch is subordinating the legislative branch to its will; and yet when an appropriation bill is before the Senate I observe that some of the distinguished Senators upon the other side of the Chamber are among the first to defend it and to justify the bureaucracy which they charged was responsible for the bill.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that if autocracy or bureaucracy assumes no worse form than it has assumed in this bill I shall be quite content. I think the Senator from Utah imagines things when he thinks that the provisions of the bill savor of anything autocratic. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Utah, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] as well, to a provision in the act of a year ago, the act upon which this is based and under which we started a system as it were to last at least during the war, the system to be under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture, for the purpose of stimulating food production. A paragraph from that act of last year reads as follows:

> For increasing food production, eliminating waste, and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, urban, and other agencies, $4,348,400.

There was the appropriation in a lump sum for the different activities, one of which is now made the subject of a motion to strike out by the Senator from Utah. If you want to discontinue the system, and this paragraph is the very essence of it all, strike out this item in regard to demonstration work.

Under the law of 1917 granting this appropriation in a lump sum, allotments were made for these different activities. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to call attention to those allotments that were made in comparison with what is now asked in specific sums for the several activities.

For extension work in the Northern and Western States, and that was made the subject of a motion the other day by the Senator from Utah to strike out, which motion did not prevail, the allotment from the gross appropriation of over $4,000,000 for that particular activity was $100,000. The estimate for 1919 is $134,200, making an increase of $33,800. They are asking that much more for 1919 than they did in 1918. I will take another. For demonstration work, the allotment in 1918 was $1,754,000. The estimate for 1919 was $1,893,000, being in excess of the allotment of last year $139,000.

The appropriations asked for may be too large, but if you strike out the entire appropriation you destroy this service. I am satisfied, if the Senator from Utah will permit me to say it, that the agents carrying out this farm-and-home demonstration work have performed a great service in the matter of stimulating food production, and if we want now to abandon the system which was adopted for the purpose of stimulating food production for the purpose of more vigorously prosecuting the war, let us strike out the whole thing. But I do not believe the Senate of the United States now sees a reason, at this period of the war, with the war yet going on, why we should discontinue the system. Yet that is what is involved in the Senator's motion with reference to this particular item.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota has been one of the most earnest of the minority Senators to denounce bureaucracy and the evils that result from an abdication by the legislative department of the Government of its constitutional functions. He and other distinguished Republicans have denounced the system under which legislation is framed by departmental clerks and bureaus and sent to Congress with the request that it be enacted into law.

The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has upon a number of occasions characterized the Senate as being a "rubber stamp." The Senator from South Dakota, who has so freely criticized the activity of executive departments in legislative matters, has indorsed the view expressed by the distinguished Senator from California. But it is rather singular that when an appropriation bill is prepared by these same executive officials and bureaus then the evil against which the Senator has so eloquently inveighed immediately becomes a virtue, and the bill is crowned with glory. If it is an appropriation bill, no matter the method by which it was prepared, it comes here as a sacred document, particularly if the appropriation calls for the expenditure of money in the State from which the Senator comes.

Appropriations by the Federal Government have tended to debauch the people and to close their eyes to extravagant, indefensible, and illegal appropriations. We are too eager to get money from the National Treasury; States are being enervated by Federal gifts. They often constitute bribes to the States, calling for their support of measures that are wrong under our dual form of government and which lead to national usurpation and a dangerous and overpowering federalism.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the Senator the direct question: Is he in favor of abandoning the system, the plan we entered upon a year ago when we passed the first food-production bill?

Mr. KING. I do not know that I am compelled to answer categorically the question submitted by my distinguished friend. I may say in passing that a number of plans have been inaugurated by the Government that I think it would be wise to abandon, and because some policy has been adopted in the past it will not incline me to continue its support when I reach the conclusion that it has served its purpose or that it has been futile in effectuating any reform or securing any benefit.

Mr. President, I do not think that the farmers of the United States now are asking for clerks and pseudo scientists and investigators and representatives of the department, and supernumeraries, to visit them. What they want more than anything else to-day is help upon the farms. I know that last fall in the State from which I come the farmers needed help to save their crops. Indeed, losses occurred because of labor shortage. The farmers were not asking that $20,000,000 be spent in sending clerks and Federal agents from Washington to teach them how to farm or save. So scarce was labor that a number of Mexicans were brought into the State to aid in harvesting the crops; but before they reached the farms of those who arranged for their services, they were induced by promise of higher wages to go elsewhere. I am told that they were promised $8 per day and received more.

In the State of Idaho tens of thousands of bushels of potatoes rotted in the ground because of the lack of labor to dig them. In the Middle West to-day and in all the agricultural districts of the United States the cry is not for clerks and educators from Washington, but for men to aid in harvesting and saving the crops.

I know, Mr. President, in many districts hundreds of acres of land have been fallow this year and will be fallow next year because of the lack of labor. I have in mind one farmer who last year farmed 600 acres, yielding wheat and other cereals, this year but 100 acres, and next year he will plant none. His only sons have been called to the war and he will be left without help in the conduct of his farm. He is unable to care for it himself and it will be absolutely impossible for him to secure the necessary aid to handle his farm. The difficulty is to get the man power. This bill withdraws from the active field hundreds and thousands of men, some of whom might be employed on the farm or perform other work, releasing men so that they could engage in work upon the farm, or some of them could go upon the field of battle and take the place of others who will be called because of the passage of this bill, if it shall pass.

Mr. President, we do not think sufficiently now of the burdens resting upon the Government. There are multitudes of projects that I should like to see appropriations made for, meritorious projects, but it would be unpatriotic; indeed it would be wellnigh treasonable to make appropriations for those projects now when the life of our country is at stake and when the interests of civilization are involved. It is so easy to make appropriations, it is so easy to put our hands into the Treasury of the United States even though we may find it empty, like old Mother Hubbard's cupboard; but it is a difficult thing to raise the money by taxation and by loans to put into the Treasury to meet the stupendous and staggering demands which are being made upon it.

Think of $8,000,000,000 to be raised in taxes for the coming year! All the savings of all the people of the entire United States in the year immediately preceding the war were only $5,000,000,000. How are we going to get $8,000,000,000 from taxation? And that is only the Federal taxes. There are the State taxes, the county taxes, the municipal taxes, the school district taxes, and the other political subdivisions of the State that impose obligations. They have to be met also, and we have now $8,000,000,000 to meet. Then in addition to that we have fifteen to seventeen billion dollars that will have to be raised, that will have to be wrung from the people by voluntary or involuntary loans.

Where is the money coming from? It is not going to fall from heaven like manna of old; we can not pluck it from the trees. Every dollar that we spend must be wrung from the people and the back of the laboring man will be bowed heavily enough by the legitimate burdens which we will be compelled to place upon his shoulders.

We ought to pause, to hesitate, and to scrutinize every appropriation bill that is brought into the Senate. There ought to be such care exercised in the examination of the appropriation bills as never before, whether they be big or whether they be little. Whatever is absolutely and imperatively demanded to win the war we shall vote for and vote for cheerfully; but whenever any project comes here for consideration calling for a single dollar, I assert that the burden of proof rests upon the proponents of the measure to show that the appropriation is needed and is imperatively demanded in this crisis and is contributory to the winning of the war.

If this bill calls for appropriations which are absolutely necessary in this dark hour, I shall gladly vote for every item in it; but it has not been shown that this bill is imperatively needed. As I said yesterday, we have given the Agricultural Department $28,000,000 for expenditure for food conservation, for the extinction of insects, for aid upon the farms, to carry on the very work that is covered by the bill now under consideration. The proper expenditure of $28,000,000 means the employment of a large number of men, thousands of men. To get competent and efficient men properly to expend $28,000,000 is going to be a herculean task. Now, we propose not only the expenditure of $28,000,000, but to give twelve or fifteen million dollars more for the same purpose and to draw more men from active work and from military service.

Mr. President, many of these items are unnecessary now, are unwarranted by the situation of the Treasury, and are unjustified by any condition in the agricultural districts. I do not believe that the farmers of the United States are demanding this legislation. I know that there would not be a hundred farmers in our country if they understood the facts of the case, if they understood the character of the $28,000,000 appropriation bill, if they understood what this bill involves and the drain upon the man power which it will result in who would support it. It is projected by a lot of faddists, by tyros in the art of agriculture.

So far as I am concerned, and with my knowledge of the agriculturists of the United States, they are getting along pretty well; the farmers know their business, and farming and agricultural work does not now need stimulation. The high prices will produce all the crops that the man power of our country is capable of bringing forth. If the farmers could get more men to work for them, they would be very much more satisfied than they will be by a measure of this character.

Mr. President, in view of the suggestion made by Senators that, perhaps, these two items relate to different geographical subdivisions of our country, I shall withdraw the motion which I just made and shall move to strike out, on line 8, page 6, the figures "$1,327,400" and to insert in lieu thereof "$500,000." I think that the whole amount ought to be stricken out, but I am not sanguine of carrying a motion to that effect. Therefore, I offer the amendment in the form I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah withdraws his amendment and submits the amendment which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 8, it is proposed to strike out $1,327,400 and in lieu thereof to insert $500,000, so as to read:

Home-demonstration work, $500,000.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as chairman of the committee, I feel that I ought to say in response to what the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has said that the regular Agricultural appropriation bill for the current fiscal year carries about $28,000,000, the amount suggested by the Senator. That is an expansion of only one or two million dollars more than the amount which has been carried in the appropriation bill during the last two or three fiscal years. It provides for the normal peace establishment, for the normal peace organization, and for the natural growth or expansion of the department.

Provision for the war activities of the Department of Agriculture is to be made entirely out of the pending bill. It proposes an appropriation of some $12,000,000 as a sort of war-preparedness measure in the way of increasing the production of food and other necessaries of life. The pending bill carries only $12,000,000 for that purpose, exclusive of the seed appropriation. The seed appropriation aggregates about $6,000,000. Apart from that, the only appropriation for war purposes, for war activities, is $12,000,000. That is, about one-half of 1 per cent of our entire annual budget is dedicated to the purpose of providing food not only for ourselves but for the allies; of providing those necessaries which are more essential to success, if possible, than are munitions themselves, or without which, I should say, munition themselves would be vain.

I agree with the Senator from Utah that every appropriation bill and every item of every appropriation bill ought to be scrutinized with the most critical care and vigilance. Wanton waste, which would be a vice in time of peace, would be a crime in time of war. It would be a double crime in a war which consists largely of a struggle of endurance; a struggle of economic forces and resources between the several contending parties.

I also agree with what the Senator says as to the independence of Congress as the legislative department of this Government and as to the right of Congress to initiate legislation. Congress might, indeed, farm out to the heads of the several departments the power to legislate, but Congress could not, if it would, vacate its responsibility for such legislation as might be enacted.

I also agree with the Senator in his criticism of paternalistic government, of too much meddling or intermeddling with the daily concerns of the people. The Senator is right when he says that our people have constructed Commonwealths and have raised this Republic to a foremost place among the nations of the earth. That has been done; but the accomplishment of this tremendous fact in history is largely due to two causes: To the intelligence, the capacity, the enterprise, and the character of our people, and to the vast and varied resources which nature has showered upon this land with such unstinted prodigality. These two forces acting in concert, man in partnership with nature, have produced this unmatched country.

But, Mr. President, we have not had an experience like the present in all our past. Whatever virtues our people may have as a Nation or as individuals, rigorous economy has not been found in their catalogue of virtues. They have not been obliged to be niggardly; they have not been obliged to stint themselves. Rigorous economy in itself is not a virtue, but when necessity commands it it ought to be respected. Whenever rigorous economy becomes essential to the preservation of the existence of our country or to the carrying forward of our arms to success it ought to be adopted not only as a virtue but should be respected as a necessity.

This is largely a war of economic resources, a war of physical endurance. It has been stated by some that the side which can make the greatest reduction in its actual physical needs will be able to last longest in this struggle of exhaustion. One distinguished economist in this country has estimated that the German people have been able to reduce their physical requirements—clothing, shoes, hats, and other physical requirements—to 40 per cent of their ordinary requirements in time of peace. That releases 60 per cent of the energy, of the constructive capacity, which is devoted in peace times to the production of these articles of consumption, to the production of munitions of war.

Our people can not go forward in their ordinary plan of living; there will be economies required to which they have not been accustomed in peace; but the reduction in their physical requirements ought to be made systematically and in such a way as not to impair health or efficiency. The appropriations under consideration, as I understand, are designed at least to teach the people, if you please, how best to do that. Our people are not born savants; they do not spring, like Minerva, from the head of Jove, already matured in their intelligence and their fitness for things. They ought to be shown or taught how to adapt themselves to this new situation with as little inconvenience and privation as possible. These appropriations are designed for that purpose, as I understand; they are to be devoted to that purpose; but it is really a war against waste. This is our war budget to carry forward a crusade against waste in this country in this hour of crisis and in this hour of supreme necessity. It can be justified upon that ground, and, I think, upon that ground alone. We have reason to suppose that it is justified; that the end justifies the means; and that the importance of the object justifies the appropriation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with the arguments which have been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] on the ground mainly that during this war mere educational efforts ought to be laid aside where they demand the man power that it is estimated will be required under the provisions of this bill. We have been educating the farmer along these lines for 25 years, and if he has not yet learned what is now proposed to be taught him by the Agricultural Department I think he could have a little recess, at least for a single year, without any great detriment to the agricultural interests of the country. But what astounds me more than anything else is the fact that we have spent hours and days in discussing how we may save the Government $100,000 or a million dollars, while the very next day we give no consideration whatever to the matter of expending three hundred or four hundred million dollars. While we are struggling to save a million or two million dollars here, and while the Senator is making his argument in favor of economy, the Secretary of the Treasury can sign an order increasing the pay of all railway employees, which immediately imposes taxes to the amount of $400,000,000 upon the taxpayers of the United States. While we are attempting to save another $200,000, he may sign another order increasing the pay of telegraphers another $300,000,000 or $400,000,000.

The Senator from Utah is pleading for farm labor and declares again and again what the farmer needs is not so much instruction as labor to take care of his crops. I agree with the Senator from Utah, but I wish the Senator had given us some little information as to how the farmer is going to get that labor. You would do him a world of good if you would point out to him where he is going to get the labor. Why, Mr. President, the crops in the United States during the year 1918 have been saved by the patriotism of the clerks in the stores of the little towns all over the United States who have volunteered to go out and help take care of them. That is practically the only farm labor the farmer now has outside of his own family.

That labor has assisted us in securing our crops, and probably in the same way it is going to secure what we put in every year, though there may be a diminished acreage.

Mr. President, if the Government of the United States says to the arbitration board, "Say to this manufacturer and to this shipbuilder, 'You must pay your laborers a dollar an hour, and you must not only pay them a dollar an hour, but you must pay them for 11 hours' work when they only perform 8 hours' work,'" as was shown by a letter which I produced here the other day, how can you expect the farmer to get labor in competition with them? That is an impossibility. There will be no farm labor obtained from the cities or anywhere else except the little villages which give their volunteer quota during the continuance of this war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. In line with what the Senator has just stated, I wish to say that recently while in the West I met a number of farmers from various parts of the West who commented upon the evil to which the Senator is now referring, and stated that if the Government and those who are engaged in the production of munitions and so-called war materials continued the present policy they would soon draw from the rural districts substantially all labor; that it would be impossible for the agriculturist to put in the crops which in the past he had cared for; and that there would be a greatly diminished crop this year and succeeding years if the war should continue that long. They wanted to know—indeed, a committee waited upon me in regard to the matter—if some legislation could not be enacted by Congress that would prevent the drawing of all the labor from the agricultural districts and the concentration of it in a few manufacturing States. They called attention to the fact that most of the war activities were being contracted for in a very few States; that there was no diffusion of war activities, as possibly there might have been, and the result was the congestion of labor and the depopulation of some districts in the United States, at least, of laborers essential to the healthy development and the normal activity of the industries there existing.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have heard a great deal, Mr. President, about the shortage of labor in the United States, but there is not such a shortage of labor. In the Government or semi-Government manufacturing establishments you will find so many employees that they are in each other's way, and if you will measure the result of the work of each individual employed you will find that there has been a remarkable decrease in efficiency. That fact has been published all over the country; we all know it. I will ask the Senator to read an article in the last issue of the Saturday Evening Post, covering the whole question of labor and showing the inefficiency due to a demoralization brought about by the fact that we have made wages so high that an ordinary laboring man can live by working three or four days a week. There is no rule to compel each individual to perform his entire duty, but, on the contrary, a system is being followed which has been acquiesced in, in fact, encouraged, by the Government, the cost-plus system, which encourages every contractor to make his work as expensive as possible to the Government, thereby increasing his own profits.

Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from Utah. We can pass a law that will insure a supply of labor to the farmer, but we will not; we have not the courage to do so. The law that ought to be passed is one which has been embodied in bills here and sent to the appropriate committee, conscripting the manhood and the womanhood of the United States. I have insisted, and shall continue to insist, that the law which compels your son to go into the trenches and work or fight 24 hours or 48 hours without ever closing his eyes, and facing death every minute, ought to be equally competent to compel my son to do an honest day's work to back him. We will not pass a law of that kind, but that is what ought to be done during the whole continuance of this war. There would be no slackers; there would be no occasion for round-ups in the city of New York or anywhere else if we would conscript the manhood of the country, call it into service, and compel it to perform an honest day's work throughout the United States. In our war work we are more than a year behind where we ought to be at this time because we have not utilized the full efficiency of the man and woman power of the Nation from the moment that we entered this great conflict.

Mr. President, I have here a letter from Mr. H. N. Owen, publisher of Farm, Stock and Home, and also an editorial from the same paper, which I shall ask the Secretary to read because they suggest a method whereby we may be able to get farm labor, but, after all reading between the lines it will be seen that when you get down to the finality of the whole thing it means the conscription of all of the energies of all of the people in the United States. I ask first that the letter may be read, and then the editorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested:

The Secretary read as follows:

FARM, STOCK, AND HOME,
Minneapolis, Minn., August 28, 1918.

Senator P. J. McCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: After giving due credit to the United States Employment Service for the splendid plan it evolved for getting and placing farm labor, I am forced to the conclusion that, as far as achieving satisfactory results, it failed to do so.

It is true there has been very little actual loss of wheat through lack of labor; that there was not was due to the voluntary cooperation of townspeople with the farmers. The Government plan failed to work, for the very reason Farm, Stock, and Home said it would—lack of men willing to go into the country when easier hours would bring more money in the cities or towns.

The Secretary of Agriculture wants a winter-wheat acreage of 45,000,000. I grant it is needed. The spring-wheat territory will be called on to furnish as much or greater acreage next year as it did this spring. As far as the northwestern spring-wheat States are concerned, this is impossible unless the labor situation is met this fall for fall plowing and next spring for seeding.

Without personal and intimate knowledge of winter-wheat country, but reasoning from analogy, I fear that 45,000,000 acres of winter wheat is very questionable unless the labor situation is met. I think I have a helpful suggestion. It is presented in the inclosed reproduction of our article in the August 15 issue of Farm, Stock, and Home. Of course, all I can do is to suggest that the situation be met as outlined. I can do little personally to see that it is done. Therefore I venture to lay the plan before you, with hope that it will meet your approval and that you will urge its adoption by both Gen. Crowder and Mr. Densmore.

The food question is of supreme importance. A hungry army is bound to be inefficient. Let's keep it fed.

Yours, sincerely,

H. N. OWEN,
Publisher.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as it is rather late, and I know the Senator from Oklahoma wants to get a vote upon his bill to-day, I ask that the editorial may be printed without reading, with the hope that those Senators who are interested in the subject will take occasion to read it. It speaks for itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Farm, Stock, and Home, Minneapolis, Minn., Aug. 15, 1918.]

WILL YOU HELP GET LABOR?

Where is the farm labor promised us by the Federal Labor Employment Agencies? This is a question the farmer is forced to ask himself—and there is no satisfactory answer.

True, the harvest is being gathered, and it will be thrashed, but this is being done largely by accommodation labor—by busy men who leave their own tasks in store and office and rally to the assistance of their farmer neighbors, or by farm men—women and children!—who are toiling as never before.

And a part of the credit for the harvest gathering is due the loyal hired men of the Northwest, who, in spite of the lure of high-priced factory jobs, have stayed by when their help was most needed.

But the outside labor that was to be furnished has not arrived in force.

The Waterloo of the wheat fields is being fought—and Blucher has not arrived.

This Waterloo is going to be won, but not by the forces promised by the Government and calculated on by the farmer.

What is the cause of this apparent failure?

The cause is the failure on the part of the Government to foresee the situation and operate jointly two of its greatest organizations—the draft boards and the labor agencies.

We have been so busy getting an army that we have overlooked the fact that the draft records place in the hands of the Government the knowledge of where all idle and nonessential men of draft age are.

We are already well into what is probably a long war—must be looked at as a long war if we are to organize for victory.

We can not, without the gravest peril to the Nation, allow our farms to go short handed.

And the necessary extension of the draft is sure further to deplete the farms of their essential labor.

Recognizing the just prior claims of the military arm of the Government, we must take immediate steps to build up the depleted labor of the farms.

To this end let us put these two machines of government—the draft organization and the labor agencies—to work on the unused man power called up by the draft.

Widen the work of the draft boards to include the listing of men called before them as engaged in essential or nonessential work. If not accepted by the Army, let all drafted men engaged in nonessential work be reported to the labor agencies as available for labor service, and hold such men subject to order for movement to whatever point they may be needed.

In other words, create out of the rejected draftees and the deferred classes a labor army, composed of those men without steady or useful occupation.

Group this army in convenient centers, give it special intensive training, prepare it to fill up the gaps that are widening in the labor field. Make it and keep it subject to the orders of the Government.

Select as its field commanders men from the industries affected—factory managers, mine managers, farmers who have handled men in a big way.

And move these labor forces through the channels of the Government employment agencies.

This plan may need modification, but a little plan will not work, and by having a plan to place men, but no men to place, we have barely escaped disaster this year. Continued reliance on luck is foolhardy.

The time for the Government to start action is now!

Crop production is absolutely limited by the amount of labor available or in sight.

Unless an adequate labor supply is found for winter-wheat seeding and fall plowing in the spring-wheat regions and unless the farmer can know that labor will be on hand another harvest, the acres will grow fewer and the food needed by the world will grow less.

This is a prospect no patriotic American views without grave forebodings.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I appreciate the very great difficulties under which the Senator from Utah labors in his effort to strike out this item from the Agricultural appropriation bill. I have attempted on numerous occasions to cut all the appropriations that I thought were superfluous. It is a most thankless task. Even if you succeed you earn nothing excepting the criticism of the gentleman who loses the appropriation, and the public forget the benefit.

I wish about two-thirds of this appropriation could be stricken out entirely, but I am not optimistic about it. The order of the day is extravagance. Just because we are spending vast sums of money and talking about millions and hundreds of millions, and occasionally billions, of dollars, we have lost all sense of mathematical proportion. Nobody around this Chamber has an idea what a million dollars is any more. We have been handling such vast sums that we do not realize how long it takes to earn even some of the smaller amounts that we are continually appropriating.

I wish the item could be stricken out, Mr. President. I think the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Dakota are correct in their contention, and I favor the diminution of this bill by that much and more.

The main object of my asking for the floor was to comment upon the charge of the Federal Trade Commission's report that the five packers are a monopoly. Abundant opportunity has been given to the Federal Trade Commission and to other jurisdictions to prove that they are a monopoly. I call attention especially to an indictment in Chicago several years ago, when my very amiable and able friend, the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], was representing the Government in the prosecution. It was there said that the five packers were monopolies and were violating—and especially Armour & Co. were indicted for violating—the antitrust laws of the United States. An indictment was framed under that act. A jury was impaneled. Evidence was heard and a verdict of not guilty was returned.

I know the composition of that jury. I knew the greater part of that jury personally. It might not be any particular recommendation to say that on that charge at least one member of the jury had served in the Illinois Legislature. He was a farmer from the Freeport (Ill.) district, the district formerly represented in the House by present Gov. Frank O. Lowden, and at present represented by JOHN C. MCKENZIE. It was a farmers' jury, with a sprinkling here and there of a business man or two from some of the cities or villages in the judicial district. I can not think that on this question of whether they were a monopoly or not there were perjured witnesses, that there was a quantity of false testimony offered, or that the jury was improperly drawn or influenced. Of course there are difficulties, as the prosecuting authority in that case knew, in finding what a monopoly is. The difficulties in that case were met by the Government, a fair presentation was had, and the question of whether they were monopolies was submitted to a jury, resulting in an acquittal.

The courts of this country have been open under the antitrust law for many years, and down to this afternoon they are still open, to present by the prosecutors any of the five packers, or all of them, for being in an unlawful combination in restraint of trade or for the purpose of controlling or having a monopoly of the particular articles of merchandise in which they deal. There is not an indictment pending in the United States against any of the packers, large or small. There is not even an investigation at the present time pending. The commission has exhausted its jurisdiction or its ability to criticize or report, evidently. It has made its report, and it is urged here now that the Senate ought to take action in accordance with the recommendations made by the commission.

They find, first, that the packers are a monopoly in slaughtering, distributing, and selling fresh meats. They find that they control, on an average, 70 per cent of the meat trade. That is the way it is generally reported in the newspapers. By reading the report carefully it is found that it is interstate trade, and not the general meat business of the country. The interstate trade is limited in the main to such articles from a packing house as can be put in a refrigerator car and distributed by the common carriers of the country.

Anybody can slaughter and distribute fresh meats in interstate trade if they wish to embark enough money in the enterprise, have the technical knowledge of the business, will build refrigerator-car lines, cold-storage plants, and the requisite equipment for the transaction of the business. There is no monopoly about it. If there is a monopoly of car lines it is because the steam railway managers many years ago refused to build refrigerator cars. Mr. Hammond many years ago approached the steam railways of Chicago and other central points and asked the steam railways to construct refrigerator cars. He had one of the original car patents, and with the model explained the purpose to be accomplished by a refrigerator car. The railroads refused to build that type of car. They said it was an experiment; that whether fresh meats could be marketed for hundreds and even thousands of miles was purely a venture in the slaughtering industry. They refused, and the packing houses in Chicago themselves were compelled to build the first refrigerator cars in order to develop their theory. Their theory turned out to be sound in practice. The refrigerator car was a success. It increased the zone of distribution, so that for many hundreds of miles from the packing-house centers of Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City, in the first instance, they could distribute their fresh meat products.

There is a maxim of transportation that every railroad man knows, like that in physics, that a railroad man abhors a vacuum. There is nothing that railroad people try to avoid like the transportation of empty car space. When the packers have loaded a car with fresh meats and sent it to Florida or Alabama in warm weather, or in the spring, the car is unloaded at its destination. It must return to its point of origin. At some time it must go back to a packing-house plant. Such a car is available for the transportation of meat and other perishable products only. Profit can be made only by carrying that kind of merchandise. So, after it reaches a southern point it has to be returned. That has led to the profitable transportation of vegetables and fruits. Following that development refrigerator boats have been built, until the steamship transportation of perishable products from Central America and South America and other tropical points has been developed along the same line as the transportation of fresh meats. All of the steamships of the fruit companies, wherever there is perishable fruit transported in that way during a long voyage, must be chilled during the transportation. These developments have all come along with the invention of the refrigerator car. The steam railroads not furnishing the cars, the packing houses were compelled to do so, and they are to-day the owners of such car lines. The equipment necessary to slaughter animals and the entire physical property of the business has been developed with the fresh-meat industry at Chicago and other points.

Gentlemen say they are monopolies. They reply and have replied to all of the Government officers, including the Food Administration, that their methods of transacting business are open to all investigators, and they have been investigated time out of mind. I do not know of a year since the original Sherman Act was passed, in 1890, or beginning in 1891, that some Chicago enterprise, and most of the time the packing industry, has not been under investigation either by the Department of Justice or by somebody connected with the Government intent upon probing their affairs.

The monopoly charge in the report of this commission is made in the claim that 70 per cent of the interstate meat trade is controlled by five packing houses, with their general offices in Chicago. The other 30 per cent belongs to what would be called the smaller packers, or the individual trade. By actual figures the entire meat business of the country, both within the State and interstate, is controlled by the five packers only to the extent of about 35 per cent. Sometimes that is stated to be 40 per cent; but 35 per cent is a fair limit of the control of the meat business of the United States by the five packers. That is the entire meat business, the local as well as the interstate trade. There is no monopoly in the meat business when only 35 per cent, a trifle over one-third, is controlled by five men, and the other 65 per cent of the business is controlled entirely outside of the five packers. A large part of this 65 per cent is done by those who do local slaughtering. Every time there is an animal slaughtered by the local butcher there is a dead waste to the community and the country at large. The greater part of the animal by-products are lost in the local slaughtering.

On this basis the Federal Trade Commission claim that there is a monopoly. As these packers state in the printed testimony, the question of monopoly is open for investigation. They say there is no monopoly. They testify to the conditions. There is competition in the purchase of live stock at the yards. At every stockyard in the country where there is a packing-house plant owned by the five packers there is competition among them every day sales are made.

It is said by several of the Senators who are in favor of following the recommendations of the commission that the stockyards are a part of the railway transportation system. That depends on where the packing house is located. Packing houses ordinarily, like factories, like steel mills, like shoe factories, are located at some place on a line of railway. They must be, in the nature of things. As a necessary part of this system, there grow up stockyards. A stockyard is no more a part of a railway transportation system than is a warehouse for dry goods. Down on Market and Adams Streets in Chicago is one of the largest granite warehouses known to the jobbing trade—Marshall Field & Co. All of the collection of dry goods made by that house in their jobbing department that is localized in Chicago goes into this building. It is taken out of the various railroads that center in Chicago. But the warehouse is no part of the transportation system of the country, nor does it constitute itself a monopoly because it happens to be a large enterprise.

The Food Administration, I think, last year, possibly along in the winter or spring, made an investigation of this same question. I do not agree with the Food Administration on a good many things, but in this investigation they came to the conclusion that it was better to leave the packers in control of the business during the war. They realized the necessity of large quantities of meat, to be delivered at stated intervals, millions upon millions of tons of meat. Mr. Hoover investigated it and found that it was indispensable, I presume, from the nature of the report, that the packers remain in charge of their property, so as to deliver these quantities of meat. Nothing is said about that in the report of the Federal Trade Commission. Prior to that time, or contemporaneously with it, the Food Administration found in its investigations that the packers ought to be limited to 9 per cent on their meat products. That was done accordingly, and no more than the 9 per cent has been earned on the meat products of the packing-house companies from that time to the present. That is not contained in the Federal Trade Commission's report.

They refer to two hundred and sixty-three and a fraction per cent of profits earned by Morris & Co. on their capital stock. They do not explain so that the public understands it, nor do they even casually refer to it in any way that can be understood in this report, that Morris & Co.'s capital stock is only $3,000,000. Their quantity of business transacted requires a much larger sum of money. They have not increased their capital stock. There has been no additional money put in in the form of capital stock, but they borrow money. They declare no dividends. They keep their accumulated surplus earnings after paying operating expenses for the purpose of increasing the available cash to carry on the war business. If the actual amount of money that Morris & Co. have in the packing business in the United States is considered their dividends on meats are limited to 9 per cent—not 263 per cent, but 9 per cent on the total investment. It is true it would be 263 per cent on $3,000,000, but their business is not transacted on a $3,000,000 basis. It would be impossible for them to handle on that basis a small part of their business and to meet the obligations under which they are placed by contract in the delivery of meats to the Government and fill their private orders. This is not mentioned, nor is any explanation of it made, in the commission's report.

They do not say, either, in the report, Mr. President, that Swift & Co. is limited to 9 per cent on the meats; neither do they say that Swift & Co., with this increased capitalization, paid only 10 per cent on the entire volume of business. That includes not only meats but all of the by-products. Here is the report of the company for the year ending September 30, 1917, the last available one I have. Their cash is $8,292,056.63.

Their accounts receivable are $82,265,714.16.

Inventory, $120,935,778.64.

Stocks and bonds, $39,716,466.88.

Real estate and improvements, including branch houses, $55,170,507.20.

A total of $306,380,523.51.

Their liabilities are as follows:

Capital stock, $100,000,000.

Surplus, $59,965,000.

Special reserve, $10,000,000.

General reserves, $6,458,542.05.

First mortgage 5 per cent bonds, net, after taking out redemptions, $31,593,500.

Taking out bills payable, accounts payable, accrued dividends, bond interest, and the like, that completes the statement of their account. Now, these different items, Mr. President, including the $100,000,000 capital stock, show total dividends paid in 1917 of 10 per cent.

The steel companies, the boot and shoe houses, all the factories of the country, the woodenware companies, the clothing companies, whether of woolen or cotton fabrics, iron and steel—there is not a concern doing business, in corporate form or a partnership, that has not earned from 10 to 500 per cent dividends. I referred to Mr. Ford's 30 per cent dividends, or 29½ per cent dividends, nearly three times the dividends paid by Swift & Co.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. Referring to the statement that he has read, and the 10 per cent dividend, is it not true that there was a large amount of money outside of the 10 per cent dividend that would have been available; that, in fact, the profit was somewhere in the neighborhood of 33 per cent?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; there are earned profits, or surplus, for 1917, and there will be for 1918. The earned profits, however, are absorbed in the purchase of live stock at the present market price, and are carried in the inventory account. They either have to keep a surplus in that way or, if it is distributed to stockholders, it must be borrowed from the banks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not now making complaint of the method of doing business. I am not speaking of that; but, as I remember that statement, they might have declared profits of something over 30 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; the profits of the year would have been over 10 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. And they might have declared a dividend of 30 per cent instead of 10 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Assume that it would have been over 10 per cent. So with nearly every successful concern in the United States that is doing business under war conditions and every prudent concern in the country. Instead of distributing all their surplus, they are holding it as an insurance fund against accident when the war may suddenly close. If the German Army should collapse suddenly, or if peace should develop, the inventory value of every concern in the United States would sag from present figures, and nothing would be more fluctuating than live stock. Inside of 24 hours the inventory values of live stock would fluctuate, in all probability, from 25 to 40 per cent. This surplus sum must be carried in order to guarantee the business. There is not a manufacturing concern in iron or steel or a manganese company in New York, Pittsburgh, or Chicago that is not to-day keeping some of its surplus as a guarantee or an insurance fund against the shrinkage that will come when peace conditions once more prevail and prices begin to gravitate to a lower level; so that they only keep these dividends for the purposes of prudential guarantee against possible losses that may come.

I do not care to take further time, Mr. President. I wish, however, to insert in the RECORD the names of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. We did not have them the other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEPTEMBER 6, 1918.

Board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States: President: Harry A. Wheeler, vice president Union Trust Co., Chicago. Director: R. Goodwyn Rhett, president People's National Bank, Charleston, S.C. Vice presidents: Willis H. Booth, vice president Hotpoint Electric Heating Co., Los Angeles; Joseph H. Defrees, Defrees, Buckingham & Eaton Co., Chicago; A. C. Bedford, chairman board Standard Oil Co., New York. Treasurer: John Joy Edson, banker, Washington, D. C. Directors: S. B. Anderson, president Anderson-Tully Co., Memphis; Harry A. Black, president Black Hardware Co., Galveston; L. C.

Boyd, vice president Indianapolis Gas Co., Indianapolis; William Butterworth, president Deere & Co., Moline, Ill.; J. E. Chilberg, president Scandinavian-American Bank, Seattle; W. L. Clause, chairman board Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. Pittsburgh; James Couzens, capitalist, Detroit; E. T. Cunningham, secretary and treasurer Monongah Glass Co., Fairmont, W. Va.; A. I. Esberg, vice president General Cigar Co., New York; Homer L. Ferguson, president Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., Newport News, Va.; Edward A. Filene, president William Filene's Sons Co., Boston; L. S. Gillette, president Plymouth Investment Co., Minneapolis; Granger A. Hollister, vice president Rochester Railway & Light Co., Rochester, N. Y.; Clarence H. Howard, president Commonwealth Steel Co., St. Louis; Frank H. Johnston, president City Coal & Wood Co., New Britain, Conn.; James R. MacColl, treasurer Lorraine Manufacturing Co., Pawtucket, R. I.; Ernest T. Trigg, vice president John Lucas & Co. (Inc.), Philadelphia; R. A. McCormick, vice president McCormick & Co., Baltimore; E. T. Meredith, publisher Successful Farming, Des Moines; Lewis E. Pierson, chairman board Irving National Bank, New York; John L. Powell, president Johnston & Larimer Dry Goods Co., Wichita; Charles A. Otis, Otis & Co., Cleveland; M. J. Sanders, manager Leyland Line, New Orleans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say that I am very anxious to finish the consideration of this bill this afternoon in order that the Senate may adjourn over until Monday. A good many Senators have expressed a desire to do so, and I am anxious to respond to their desire if possible. I hope, therefore, that as far as possible Senators will remit collateral and foreign matters to the future in order that this program may be carried out.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is apparent that motions to strike items from an appropriation bill are not regarded with very much favor by Senators who obviously are very much interested in preserving the Treasury of the United States. I have the temerity, however, to suggest another amendment; but, first, before suggesting it, I will ask the chairman of the committee if he will not accept an amendment to strike out, on page 8, lines 16 and 17, the words:

Fertilizer survey of the United States, $100,000.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course I do not carry in my memory what the estimate of the department has to say concerning this particular appropriation; but with the statement which I think I ought to make to the Senator that it will be given very careful consideration in conference, I shall not interpose any very rigorous protest against the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please restate his amendment.

Mr. KING. I move to strike out, in lines 16 and 17, page 8, the words:

Fertilizer survey of the United States, $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to call my colleague's attention to the fact that the amount is $100,000 now, and if the $100,000 is stricken out I promise my colleague that it will not be less than $200,000 when it comes back to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Well, it will probably be that, anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee in regard to one item here, the item for furnishing labor. I do not see it just at this moment. In view of the appropriation of $7,000,000 which was made recently for the purpose of enabling the Department of Labor to handle the labor situation, to procure labor not only for war activities but for the country generally, and in view of the fact that that legislation was enacted long after this bill was formulated, does not the fact of that legislation dispense with the necessity of this appropriation?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator was complaining this afternoon, and very justly, and the complaint was joined in by the Senator from North Dakota, of the shortage of labor on the farms—a shortage for which the Government is in some measure, I think, responsible. Now, the shortage of labor will have to be supplied either by the use of fertilizer, I may say, improved machinery, improved breeds of stock, or the use of women and children on the farm. I take it that this small appropriation to provide farm labor is in order to enable the Department of Agriculture, which has its various county agents and demonstrators throughout the United States, who are in touch with the farm-labor demand and the farm-labor supply, to articulate with the Department of Labor itself. Of course the Department of Labor is more closely in contact with organized labor, skilled labor, labor in the cities, urban labor supplies; and I assume that this is to enable the two departments to articulate with each other in securing, as far as possible, an adequate supply of farm labor.

Mr. KING. I was very much in favor of giving to the Labor Department wide latitude and considerable authority in securing the necessary labor in the various activities of the Government. I feel that that department is now carrying forward as far as it is possible the agriculturist. If, however, the Senator thinks this will aid the farmer in any way, I shall not move to strike out the item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of the two amendments reserved. Without objection, the amendments with the exception of the two reserved will be concurred in. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Martin	Smoot
Bankhead	Henderson	Nelson	Sterling
Borah	Kellogg	New	Thomas
Brandegee	Kendrick	Norris	Townsend
Cummins	Kenyon	Nugent	Trammell
Curtis	King	Overman	Underwood
Dillingham	Kirby	Poindexter	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lenroot	Robinson	Walsh
France	McCumber	Shafroth	Watson
Gerry	McKellar	Sheppard	Wilfley
Gore	McNary	Sherman

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and also to announce that he is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum of the Senate present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to his name when called.

Mr. FALL, Mr. BENET, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. GUION, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. JONES of New Mexico entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will report the first amendment reserved, the amendment reserved by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] reserved for a separate vote the action of the Senate on the amendment upon page 3, line 1, where, on motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the following words were stricken from the bill:

Production of beef cattle, $105,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the second amendment reserved.

The SECRETARY. What is known as the prohibition amendment, on page 6, reserved by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I should like to have read.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment known as the prohibition amendment insert:

Provided, That immediately after June 30, 1919, the President of the United States shall appoint a commission of three persons who shall proceed to fix the value of all distilled spirits remaining in bond on June 30, 1919, and report the value thereof as soon as practicable to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon transmit the detailed report of the value of said spirits to Congress, and on reception of said report Congress shall, if satisfied with the value fixed by said commission, provide for the payment to the owners either in cash or in 30-year 4 per cent Government bonds, as Congress may determine.

If the valuation fixed by the commission is not satisfactory to Congress the matter shall be referred back to the commission for a further report thereon, and the commission shall proceed as soon as possible to make an additional report, and upon the making of such additional report Congress shall provide for the payment to the owners of such distilled spirits either in cash or in 30 year 4 per cent Government bonds, as Congress may determine; and upon payment to the owners title to said distilled spirits shall vest in the United States.

The President shall direct the commission to make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the full purpose of this act: Provided further, That the said valuation so fixed by said commission shall not exceed the cost of said spirits to the date of the report of said commission, including transportation, storage, insurance, and similar expenditures.

Any person, firm, or corporation owning any property coming within the terms of this act, if not satisfied with the amount fixed as to the value thereof by the commission may present the matter, together with a record thereof, to the Court of Claims of the United States, and there have the same reviewed as to the value only of said property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate more than a few moments. I am in favor of prohibition, State and national. I voted to submit the constitutional amendment to the States for their ratification. I voted for the so-called Sheppard amendment to the pending Agricultural bill. If I believed for one moment the adoption of the amendment which I have offered would in any way impede prohibition or interfere with it in the slightest degree, I would be perfectly satisfied to remain silent.

But, Mr. President, I believe the adoption of the amendment would be a great aid finally in the full establishment of prohibition in this country. While I am in favor of prohibition, I am not in favor of confiscation. I am not one of those who believe that the Government of the United States has the right to take private property without compensation for it; it does not make any difference to me whether it is for the purpose of prohibition or otherwise.

The amendment which I have offered and which was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole provides that the President shall appoint a commission of three. The commission is authorized and directed to investigate the cost of the spirits remaining in bond on the 30th of June next. It can not bring in an award for an amount greater than the cost because it is limited by the amendment to the cost. I do not believe there will be scarcely any whisky in bond at that time. I believe it will all practically be taken out and disposed of; but if there should remain a few million gallons of distilled spirits in bond at the time, what are the owners going to do with it? They can not sell it. Some gentlemen say, "Well, they could export it." So they could, perhaps, if there was a demand for its export. They can not give it away. It is a complete loss, as I see it, to the owner of the distilled spirits that remain in bond at that time. It will be a small amount.

One of the chief reasons why I believe this amendment ought to be adopted is that it will be entirely satisfactory to the owners of this property and it will prevent, in my judgment, the institution of suits to test the constitutionality of the law. I am not a lawyer; I do not know whether it is unconstitutional or not; but a great many of the best lawyers in the country are of the opinion that at least it is a very doubtful question. This will settle all that. It will satisfy everybody and pay a reasonable amount on the quantity of whisky still in bond. Nobody can say that it is not right, nobody can say that it is not just, and I can not see any reason why this amendment should not be permitted to go to conference and let them thrash it out. If the conferees should think there is any good reason why it should not be adopted, they can reject it. That is my reason for offering it. I do not know what the Senate will do about it, but I should like to have a vote upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama either ought to be adopted or some similar measure of relief ought to be inserted in this bill. There are 151,000,000 gallons of whisky in bond, for which $3.20 a gallon special tax under the law as it exists now will be charged to the owners. Three dollars and twenty cents will be collected from them, and then they will not be allowed to sell it in the United States. The only thing open is export, and that amounts to nothing. You can not export whisky now. Why should the Government do an unmoral thing, to collect $3.20 from the owners of spirits in bond and then refuse them the right to sell it in the United States? To my mind that is as unmoral as the most intemperate use of liquor that could be imagined.

I want to offer and have printed without reading at this time a statement of the spirits in bond, showing the effect unless some relief is had in some way such as is proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEPTEMBER 3, 1918.

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: For your information, reference to the prohibition bill, I give you the following facts:

First. Spirits in bond September 30, 1917, 191,000,000 gallons; spirits in bond June 30, 1918, 151,000,000 gallons; amount disposed of during past nine months, 40,000,000 gallons.

Second. This would indicate an estimate of 60,000,000 gallons tax paid, at $3.20 a gallon, in the past 12 months.

Third. The estimates of floor stocks on hand in wholesale and retail liquor houses at the present time is 40,000,000 gallons, which all dealers will hasten to dispose of before withdrawing other goods from bond. Considering the fact that there were some floor stocks on hand September 30, 1917, I would estimate that if this law passes discontinuing the sale of liquor on June 30, 1919, that there would be withdrawn up to that date about 50,000,000 at a $3.20 tax rate. If this tax rate should be doubled, about 20,000,000 would be withdrawn; therefore, under our present rate of withdrawal and the tax at $3.20 a gallon, we would have left in bond on June 30, 1919, 101,000,000 gallons, for the following reasons: Much of the territory that we have been selling in is now dry and closed. The transportation facilities are exceedingly poor and much business is lost on account of not being able to deliver goods on time. The distiller has sold these goods in bond to jobbers who in turn have sold them to retail dealers. According to the revenue laws, the distiller would be responsible to the United States Government for the tax on all whiskies in bond when the eight-year bonded period expires. That would make our firm responsible to the United States Government for tax on 32,000 barrels of whisky at whatever the Government tax rate would be at the expiration of the eight-year bonded period. It can easily be seen that in passing this act that you are confiscating the property held by the distiller, the jobber, or the retailer. In addition to that you are creating a hardship upon the distiller for the payment of taxes on these goods over which he has no control at the present time. The party holding them is not compelled by law to pay the Government tax, but would throw the burden of doing so on the distiller. These facts can not be controverted, and some relief should be given, either by extending the time or by not increasing the tax or by agreeing to pay for the spirits that may be left in bond, at a reasonable price, on June 30, 1919, if that should be the date finally decided on for stopping sales.

Very truly, yours,

———.

Mr. CURTIS. At the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment the following:

And provided further, That the commission, in determining the sum to be paid the owners of such liquors, shall deduct (1) the expenses incurred by the Nation, States, counties, and municipalities traceable to the use of intoxicating liquors; (2) such sum as may be deemed sufficient to compensate the State and Nation for the criminals, lunatics, and imbeciles traceable, in whole or in part, to the use of intoxicating liquors; (3) such sum as may be deemed a fair value for the lives lost, the hearts broken, the homes wrecked, the orphans made, and the poverty produced by or through the use of intoxicating liquors; (4) such other sum as will compensate individuals, families, municipalities, and States for any other injury traceable, in whole or in part, to the use by anyone of intoxicating liquors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the amendment just offered on behalf of the Senator from Washington displays the delicacy of his humor or the withering nature of his satire, as you may see fit to take it, but his amendment displays the measure of his regard for the property rights of other people if the possession of it runs counter to his idea of what really ought to be. Whatever my opinion may be of the use, possession, or sale of any particular kind of legal property, and however anxious I might be to destroy it for the common good, I could not conscientiously take it from the owner without just compensation.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am as much in favor of temperance as any prohibitionist in this body or elsewhere. I have not adopted prohibition as a profession. I make no money or political capital out of it, nor do I try to do so. I am only trying, in the support of this amendment, to avoid the possible and, as I see it, very probable confiscation of property in the hands of people held largely as security for money advanced.

Advances on warehouse receipts have been heretofore fully secured by the whisky in bond and has been the safest security held by many banks in many of the States. An impossible date set for the sale, and a refusal by the Government to take at cost price the remnant that could not be sold, by reason of the Government's action, strikes my mind and yours as an inexcusable injustice. But the answer comes, "You can export it." How, I ask, unless you can take it out of bond, and how get it out of bond unless the banks advance still further sums and trust to an uncertain foreign market for their returns. I fear many innocent business men may be ruined by such drastic action. I am amazed at the requirement in this bill that after June next all whisky in bond shall be exported. How is the cause of morals or temperance served by such a course? The whisky will go to England to be consumed by soldiers at the front. We banish it from our regulation and supervision and send it to our armies abroad. I see no virtue or sense in this. Prohibition does not mean confiscation.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; it does.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Under this bill I admit that in all probability property will be confiscated. If sufficient time had been given in which to safeguard these securities and get the product out of bond no serious question could arise. The end of next year would have been time sufficient, in my judgment, and in that of those holding millions of these securities. Is this to be construed as an argument against temperance? I trust not. Rather let it be known as an argument against confiscation. I voted for the constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture or sale of whisky in these United States; I shall probably vote for this measure, but with that reluctance which follows the fear of taking other people's property without compensation..

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows what classes of citizens have received advances from the banks upon alcoholic spirits?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The class who have received such advances are the men who themselves made the whisky and which is still in bond as security.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I saw a list the other day of some 52 men in Kentucky alone who had become millionaires by the sale of spirituous liquors since the law became effective prohibiting their manufacture, and I wondered, in my own mind, if that were true, whether the banks had not advanced the money to the men who bought the liquor from those who had become millionaires, thinking, perhaps, that whisky was going still higher in price.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am afraid the Senator from Utah is leading me into the field of conjecture.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not want to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know nothing more as to that than does the Senator himself. I am speaking only of the question to which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] alluded, and that was the very possible, and not only possible but imminently probable, fact that many perfectly innocent people will lose their security if you say that on the 30th day of next June all whisky in bond shall have no sale in the United States. The banks which have loaned on this article have loaned to the distillers for the purpose of enabling them to take the whisky out of bond. You all know the tax on whisky is four times the amount the whisky itself is worth. The bank advances money to the maker to enable him to release from bond and holds security on that not taken out.

The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will not hurt the cause of temperance. If it would I would not be advocating it. I do not want to see another gallon of whisky made in the world; I do not believe there will be another gallon legitimately made in the United States. It seems to me as though the great cause has been gained, so far as human legislation can possibly gain it. The only question involved is to save the banks or at least to let the Government purchase not at remunerative prices of this speculative article under this amendment but at the cost prices to the men who made it. We have destroyed their distilleries; the millions of dollars which they have invested in them have already been lost. Some of them may have recouped themselves, as the Senator from Utah says, by having sold the whisky at enough profit to have reimbursed them for the great distilleries which have been lost.

My only purpose now is, if I can, to save those people who have been acting in good faith, in simply attempting to save the money that they have invested in it and which was invested when it was a perfectly legitimate and legal enterprise.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to inquire of the Senator whether rectified spirits are held in bond.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not a fact that the distilled liquors only are held in bond?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. And rectified spirits, which are artificial spirits, are not held in bond at all?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No.

Mr. THOMAS. Therefore, unless we enact something like the Bankhead amendment, will not the result be that the man who manufactures artificial whisky, known as rectified spirits, although taxed, will be able to get his money back by placing his wares upon the market, while the manufacturer of distilled spirits, upon which he has paid a tax and which he is required to place in bond, will suffer a loss equal to the amount invested plus the tax if something of this kind is not done?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is exactly my understanding of the situation.

Mr. THOMAS. Then we encourage and protect the man who manufactures the artificial and poisonous stuff as compared with the distilled product, the business in which is conducted in a legitimate way under the law?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no doubt in the world that that will be the ultimate result of this legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are 151,000,000 gallons of spirits in bond in the United States. The tax on such spirits is $3.20 a gallon, which amounts to $483,000,000, or nearly half a billion dollars, to be collected from the owners, who will be denied the right to sell it under existing conditions of the revenue laws.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is the point I was attempting to make. I do not care for the revenue it may cost the Government, sadly as we need it, if we can get rid of the use of this article throughout our country and at the same time preserve the people who happen now to own it from an absolute confiscation of their property. That is the only question with me; it is the only question with the Senator from Alabama—as to whether or not under an effort to do the right thing for the great public we shall do the wrong thing to many an individual whose all is invested in what was and is up to date a recognized legal business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is in the third degree and therefore not in order. I refer to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] on behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition of the committee originally was to strike out and insert, and under Rule XVIII both the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted may be amended. The Chair thinks that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, under Rule XVIII, is an amendment in the first degree, and therefore the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is not proposed to destroy this property at this time, and that the Senate ought to consider before they enter upon this reimbursement that they are entering upon a very extensive field of expenditure. I am not going to discuss the merits of it at all, but if we make reimbursement for this whisky we can not refuse reimbursement to the vineyards and the brewers. The vineyards must all be compensated, as well as the brewers, because the same dstruction of property precisely is involved. I think it is well for the Senate to consider the fact that they may be about to open a very large field of expenditure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I sent for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama. I find that in it there is a proviso written in pen and ink from which I think one word has been omitted which is necessary in order to make sense. I will ask the Secretary to state the proviso that is written in ink.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will state the proviso.

The SECRETARY. The proviso comes in the Senate amendment at the end of line 19, after the word "act," as follows:

Provided further, That the said values so fixed by said commission shall not exceed the cost of said spirits——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is the word "exceed" there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that it is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I wanted to know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask for a division.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his named was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Because of my general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who has been called from the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. Not knowing how he would vote, in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS (when the name of Mr. JONES of Washington was called). I again announce the pair of the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. Were he present, the junior Senator from Washington would vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). Being paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea." I will announce that the Senator from Kansas is necessarily absent.

Mr. MCKELLAR (when the name of Mr. SHIELDS was called). The senior Senator from Tennessee is unavoidably absent on important business.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. MARTIN (when Mr. SWANSON's name was called). My colleague Mr. SWANSON is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. Were he present he would vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. As he has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business. If he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. WALSH. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. MYERS]. He is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire if the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore refrain from voting, he not being present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I transfer that pair to my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is detained on important business. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD].

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bankhead	Gerry	Ransdell	Thomas
Brandegee	Gulon	Robinson	Underwood
Fall	Phelan	Sherman	Wilfley
Frelinghuysen	Pomerene	Smith, Ariz.

NAYS—36.

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Benet	Kendrick	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Kenyon	New	Smoot
Cummins	King	Norris	Sterling
Curtis	Lenroot	Nugent	Sutherland
France	Lodge	Pittman	Townsend
Gore	McCumber	Poindexter	Trammell
Hale	McKellar	Shafroth	Vardaman
Henderson	McNary	Sheppard	Walsh

NOT VOTING—43.

Baird	Harding	Lewis	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hardwick	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Hitchcock	Myers	Swanson
Chamberlain	Hollis	Overman	Thompson
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Owen	Wadsworth

Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Watson
Fernald	Kellogg	Reed	Weeks
Fletcher	Kirby	Saulsbury	Williams
Goff	Knox	Shields	Wolcott
Gronna	La Follette	Simmons

So Mr. BANKHEAD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, during the debate on the prohibition amendment I made reference to a statement by Representative KAHN, of California, as to the time that would be required by the wine industry to go out of business. In order to be perfectly fair to him—and I did not intend to misquote him in any way—I wish to put in the RECORD the excerpts from his testimony before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry bearing on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the matter referred to by him. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask that the matter be read.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be glad to read it.

In response to a question on the subject, Representative KAHN said:

I am under the impression, as I said, that if they were given five months to harvest grapes and turn out their vintage, that would probably take care of those wine makers whose grapes ripen at the latest period. That is about the only suggestion I could make on that matter.

This testimony was given on the 13th of June. Five months from June would be November. I made the statement that he said October.

Another section of his testimony was as follows:

Senator PAGE. This amendment of Senator JONES limits the time beyond which no fruits can be made into wines to 30 days. What time would you suggest to take care of this year's business?

Representative KAHN. In the State of California wine making begins at different times. Probably the farther south you go the earlier the grapes ripen. I think that the "campaign," as they call it, begins some time in the early part of August and runs along until well toward the middle or end of October, and during all that period wine is being made, depending upon the character of the climate, the soil, and so on.

Senator PAGE. If this limit of 30 days were made 4 months, would that extension be sufficient to take care of your wine growers?

Representative KAHN. I suppose they would be able to harvest their grapes and make their wine by that time. I should imagine so. Five months would probably do it.

Another excerpt is as follows:

Senator PAGE. Mr. KAHN, may I ask this question? In reading the Jones amendment I see it provides that from and after 30 days from the date of approval of the act no foods, food materials, etc., shall be used for malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes. Would you say that by changing 30 days to 120 days you would eliminate the objections you are stating?

Representative KAHN. I think in all fairness, Senator, in view of the condition which brought about the making of their vineyards, that these people should be allowed to dispose of that vintage. I should say that would take approximately a year.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it was very material that the time be stated, so far as the judgment of the Senate is concerned, as to the position of Representative KAHN, who was quoted as having said that four months would be necessary in which to market the present wine crop of California. Now it appears that the Senator from Texas was in error, and he makes the amende; but the Senate is informed rather late that the Representative from California, Mr. JULIUS KAHN, did state in the testimony taken before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that it would require a full year before the vintage could be harvested and disposed of. The President of the United States was consulted, and he asked for a year.

I now submit an amendment, in view of the status of the matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes, I desire to state that in two different instances Mr. KAHN said that the time for harvesting should be five months. At another time he said there should be one year for harvesting and selling. I was somewhat confused a few days ago in endeavoring to recall what he said, and I have therefore had his testimony read. I did not recall the distinction he made between harvesting grapes and selling wine. His own statement as to the time required is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that the Senator from Texas has already sent an amendment to the desk for the purpose of offering it, and until that is disposed of nothing else can be considered.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, very briefly I wish to say that we must distinguish between harvesting the crop and disposing of the crop. Representative KAHN was perfectly right in saying that it would require four months to harvest the crop and a year to dispose of the crop; so, when it is in order, I will submit an amendment extending the time for one year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from Texas to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the first paragraph, after the following words: "After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States during the continuance of the present war and period of demobilization," the following:

Provided, That this provision against importation shall not apply to shipments en route to the United States at the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I think the amendment explains itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "June 30" and insert "December 30," so that it will read:

After December 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the progress of the debate the Senator from Minnesota alluded to the fact that very large compensation was paid a number of these peripatetic travelers who went around doing work under a bill which was the predecessor of this bill. It seems to me that the salaries and compensation of those employed by the department for doing this work ought not to be greater than the compensation paid for like services to employees now in the department. To meet the evil to which the Senator from Minnesota and others have referred, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, on page 6, line 11, after the figures "$6,100,000," the following——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that that has been agreed to, and under the parliamentary status is not now subject to amendment, the only matters reserved being the two amendments reserved—the one by the Senator from Wyoming and the other by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. KING. Then I offer it as a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course, the Senator can offer his amendment after the pending amendment has been disposed of. The amendment called the prohibition amendment is the pending amendment at this time.

Mr. KING. Oh, I supposed that had been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment as amended.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, we have had only one roll call, I think, on this entire prohibition proposition, and that was the roll call upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. I am in favor of the prohibition amendment, and I want an opportunity to go on record. I presume that there will be no objection to a yea-and-nay vote. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment as amended. On that question the Senator from New Mexico calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when Mr. BAIRD's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BAIRD]. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made previously, I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who has been called away. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GRONNA's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when the name of Mr. JONES of Washington was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and to state that if he were present he would vote "yea." He is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. MCKELLAR (when Mr. SHIELDS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and to say that, were he present, he would vote "yea" on this and the other prohibition amendments. He is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is absent and is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea" on this question. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTIN (when Mr. SWANSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). Making the transfer of my pair that I announced a moment ago, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCNARY. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HALE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FERNALD]. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. MYERS], if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 6, as follows:

So the amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. KING. I offer the following amendment as a new section at the proper place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator that he add it at the end of the bill.

Mr. KING. Yes; I move to add it at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following:

That no person employed under the provisions of this act shall receive any greater salary or compensation than that paid to other persons employed in the Agricultural Department for similar or like services.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there is one word of explanation which I feel obliged to make before the final vote is taken on this bill, and I hail the approaching end with as much rapture as any Member of the Senate.

I prepared and had printed an amendment which I intended at the time to offer to the pending measure. The amendment I refer to proposed to advance the price of wheat from $2.20 a bushel to $2.46 a bushel for the harvest of 1919. That is 14 cents less a bushel than the amount carried in the measure vetoed by the President, which related to the harvest of 1917 instead of the harvest of 1918, the latter harvest being the one involved in the measure which met the presidential veto.

I have decided not to offer the amendment to this bill. It was my original intention and purpose to offer it to this measure because, as this is not an appropriation bill, it could have been adopted by a majority vote of the Senate. To remit this amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which will come forward in a few days, will require a two-thirds majority of the Senate. To remit it to the regular appropriation bill, which will come up in the regular session next winter, will also require a two-thirds majority. It is not good strategy to maneuver out of a situation where a majority would be sufficient into a situation where a two-thirds majority will be required under the rules of the Senate. I appreciate that as much as any Senator. But the chairman of the Finance Committee is extremely anxious to know the fate of the proposed prohibition amendment. Involved in the amendment is something like a billion dollars of revenue. The House to-day proceeded to the consideration of the new revenue bill. The Senate Finance Committee began hearings upon that measure to-day. That measure must be enacted at an early date. It is desirable, if not necessary, to know what shall be the fate of prohibition and the revenue involved before the new revenue measure can be finally enacted into law. The wish of the chairman of the Finance Committee has had great weight with me in reaching the conclusion which I have now announced.

In addition to that a great many Senators who are friendly to an advance in the price of wheat are deeply interested in the pending prohibition amendment and they have requested me not to offer that amendment to this bill, lest, if it should be adopted, it might meet a similar fate; that is, it might result in the veto of this measure and in the loss of the prohibition amendment. I do not share their view. I think it is a mistake for Senators who are at once the enemies of whisky and the friends of wheat to insist upon the adoption of this course. The national constitutional amendment will be ratified by a sufficient number of States next January. It will go into effect as the supreme law of the land next January or February, 1919.

The pending prohibition amendment does not prohibit until June 30 of next year. The extreme prohibitionists will, indeed, have seven dry months. They will begin national prohibition seven months earlier under this amendment than if they bided their time under the national Constitution amendment. There will be seven months within which whisky can not be sold.

But, Mr. President, every gallon of whisky in bond will be withdrawn before June 30 next and will be sold and will be purchased and will be consumed at the leisure or at the pleasure of its possessors. There will not under this pending amendment be one gallon more of whisky sold, purchased, and consumed in the United States, in my judgment, than would have been had they waited for the actual operation of the national constitutional amendment.

Senators have seen this subject in a different light, and I am not willing to embarrass them, nor am I willing to obstruct or delay the final enactment and approval of this law.

For these reasons I shall not offer the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I voted against the prohibition amendment. I wish to say to the Senate that I am decidedly in favor of prohibition. I have voted for every constitutional measure submitted to the Senate looking to prohibition. I regard this measure as an unconstitutional invasion of the police powers of the States, and, therefore, as strongly as I favor national prohibition I could not vote for it.

I am anxious to see this country placed on a prohibition basis. I voted to make this District dry. I voted to submit a constitutional amendment to the States making the whole Nation dry. I did what I could to have the State of Louisiana ratify this constitutional amendment. I wish I could have voted for prohibition to-day, but, believing as I do that the amendment just adopted is clearly unconstitutional, I voted against it.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have no wish to prolong the session by a call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and I assume, inasmuch as the Chair is about to put the question, the yeas and nays will not be called for. I simply, therefore, wish to state that I shall vote against this bill, as I regard it as an extravagant, unjust, and unwise policy.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products,' and for other purposes."

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GORE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. FRANCE conferees on the part of the Senate.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is upon the table of the Vice President a House message showing the passage of Senate bill 1419 with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I understand it is expected that the bill will not be brought before the Senate for a day or two, and I ask that the House substitute be printed for the use of the Members of the Senate. It is very important that Senators shall be able to read the bill that has been substituted by the House for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is desired to have a meeting to-morrow of the conferees on House bill 11283, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], one of the conferees, is absent and desires that some Senator shall take his place. I shall be glad, therefore, if the Chair will appoint some other member of the committee to take his place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that course will be taken. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. In the place of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] the Chair will appoint the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MINERAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, be laid before the Senate. I make the request at this time so that it may become the unfinished business. I do not wish to interfere with any adjournment over until Monday, as I understand is the desire of Senators, but I should like to have the bill made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11259.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, which had been reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining with an amendment.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 9, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 6, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee that truth lives and is marching on. The eternal years of God are hers. Cast Thy bread upon the waters, for Thou shalt find it after many days. The truth contained in these words, which have come down to us out of the ages, is vindicating itself in the more than one million and a half of American soldiers in suffering France to-day, who by their deeds of heroism will cancel to a degree the debt we owe to France through Lafayette, Rochambeau, and many patriots who came to our fathers in the time of need.

We thank Thee that the American people will celebrate the birth of Lafayette in song and story to-day. Long may his memory live, and his deeds, to inspire men with patriotism and love of liberty.

God of love, our hearts go out in sympathy to the Member of this House and his wife, in this hour of trial and sorrow, in the loss of their precious little son. Comfort and sustain them in this hour of grief, through the hopes vouchsafed to us in the promises of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OVERSTREET, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STRONG, for one week, on account of important business.

REQUEST TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of my work in Congress. Somebody objected to that request yesterday and I renew it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of his work in Congress. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take it the gentleman wants to go over what he has done and put together certain speeches he has made, or portions of them. I understand he has that right now.

Mr. LONDON. No; I intend to print a short review of my work and general policy which I have followed in Congress. This is my only opportunity to make clear the purpose, spirit, and policy of my work.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. BARNHART], whom I do not see here, as to the scarcity of paper, and for fear that others may make similar requests, for the present I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

The SPEAKER. By a special order of the House the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is entitled to 10 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an editorial in the Boston Evening Transcript of August 22, in which I am denounced as an obstructionist to the war program and in which my resignation or removal as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is demanded.

Perhaps I would never have known of this editorial had it not been for the fact that it was caught by my home paper, the Montgomery Advertiser, one of the oldest daily newspapers in the South, it having recently celebrated its ninetieth anniversary.

This editorial is in line with the propaganda inspired by the National Security League. Certain portions of the press have given it publicity and indorsed the program. Its purpose is too manifest to require exemplification.

My record is assailed on account of votes cast, or stated to be cast, both before and since the declaration of war. Ordinarily I am opposed to the use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to reply to a newspaper libel. In this particular case, however, as my home paper has denounced this editorial as "sheer mendacity," and in view of the further fact that this propaganda is being used against other Members of Congress, both Republicans and Democrats, whose course has been in accord with my own, I feel justified in consuming a few moments of the time of the House with this particular personal matter.

The charges against my record and those who voted as I did embrace matters prior to the entry of the United States into war.

One relates to the vote on the naval appropriattion bill. This vote was cast in line with the recommendation of the committee. It is sufficient to state that the Navy has boasted of the fact that it has been able to cope with the situation with the nucleus provided for under the peace program that the Naval Committee recommended and for which Congress provided. It is a remarkable situation that we have landed more than a million and a half soldiers in France with only one Army transport sunk and with the loss of comparatively few men. [Applause.]

I am also charged with voting against amendments to make the Army either 220,000 or 250,000. The difference between an army of even 125,000 and 250,000 in the great military program now in progress is infinitesimal. As the lawyers say, de minimis non curat lex—the law does not bother with trifles.

I admit that under peace conditions I was in favor of building up the National Guard under Federal rules and regulations and under Federal control rather than a large regular standing army. It was this plan that was adopted in the national defense act; by reason of it we were able to put in the war between 400,000 and 500,000 men with experience and service. In view of the splendid record of the Rainbow Division, which represents nearly every State in the Union and a separate division of New England National Guardsmen upon the western battle front, I have no apology to make for my stand in behalf of the citizen soldiery. [Applause.]

I became a member of the Committee on Military Affairs at the organization of the Sixty-first Congress, at which time the committee was under the control of a Republican majority, and a distinguished gentleman, Gov. Hull, of Iowa, was then chairman. It may not be generally known, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that at no time since my membership on the committee, in any annual appropriation bill, has the War Department, either under a Republican or Democratic administration, asked Congress to appropriate for the maximum number of men provided for by law.

Until recently, and only since war has been declared, Congress has always fixed the maximum number of men for the Army, and the War Department has estimated for the number to be appropriated for in each annual appropriation bill. For instance, up to the time of the Spanish-American War the standing army of the United States was limited by law to 25,000 men. After the Spanish-American War it was increased to 100,009. Under the national defense act of June 3, 1916, authority was given to raise it to 175,000 men.

I repeat that under neither Republican nor Democratic administration has the Military Committee of the House been requested to appropriate for the maximum number of men authorized by Congress under the law. It is, of course, the appropriation which counts, because unless you have the money you can not pay the men.

I shall, however, now call attention to a feature of this editorial which is absolutely indefensible. It will be noted that the editorial referred to the National Security League. Other metropolitan papers have taken up the same cudgel. Therefore unquestionably it is apparent that there is some sort of political propaganda directed against Members of Congress, whether Democrat or Republican, who fail to obey the edict of this self-constituted National Security League.

In this editorial of August 22, the Boston Transcript charges, naming the specific days, that I voted for the McLemore resolution, for the Cooper amendment, and against the declaration of war with Germany.

These are matters of record. It might be pardonable if the editor of the Boston Evening Transcript had been misled by some false rumor that was not a matter of record, but it is an unpardonable sin for a paper supposed to be respectable to deliberately falsify the record. [Applause.] If the Boston Transcript does not get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it could have easily obtained a copy from some public library in Boston, and instead of stating deliberately that on March 7, 1916, I supported the McLemore resolution, it could have ascertained that I voted for the motion of Mr. FLOOD, of Virginia, to lay the McLemore resolution on the table. If the editor of this paper, before falsifying my vote, had examined the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 1, 1917, he would have found that instead of voting for the motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin relative to the arming of American merchant ships I am recorded exactly the other way. [Applause.]

To cap the climax, this editor charges me specifically with having voted against the declaration of war with Germany on April 5, 1917, when the RECORD shows that I voted to the contrary.

That there can be a difference of opinion as to the best method of raising an army and the age at which the youth of the land should be called to military service no honest man can deny.

It is a sad condition that there should be an element in this country seeking discord rather than harmony among those who desire and are seeking the best method of winning this war. I fear the Greeks, even when bearing gifts. [Applause.]

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. I have conferred with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and we have agreed that after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan on tomorrow I shall undertake to bring up the Agricultural appropriation bill. In justice to Members who expected that we would take up that bill this morning, I felt that I ought to make this statement.

The SPEAKER. All Members will give heed to that announcement.

REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes; and pending that I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] control half the time during the general debate, and that I control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12863, and pending that he asks that until definite arrangements are made about the length of time of the debate he control one-half the time and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] the other half. Is there objection

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, this is perhaps the most important legislation that has ever come before the House of Representatives. To me it would seem essential that there should be a large attendance, not only now but throughout the consideration of the bill. I think I state the position of the committee accurately when I say that we believe the discussion of the various features of this bill will be productive of good. We will be glad if gentlemen can offer suggestions which, after consideration, may be embodied in the bill. Therefore I give notice that I shall feel at least inclined to ask that a quorum be present during the discussion of this bill. Certainly I think that there ought to be a quorum here now, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to the motion will say aye.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, is not this an automatic call?

The SPEAKER. Yes; but first we must ascertain whether there is a quorum. If there is a quorum here, there will be no call.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for a division on the vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has made the point of order that there is no quorum present, and that supersedes everything. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-six Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 256, nays 0, answered "present" 2, not voting 172, as follows:

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY with Miss RANKIN.

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. EAGAN with Mr. PARKER of New York.

Mr. GALLIVAN with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. WILSON of Texas with Mr. FARR.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BROWNING.

Mr. HENSLEY with Mr. MUDD.

Mr. PADGETT with Mr. HICKS.

Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. FOSS.

Mr. VINSON with Mr. MOTT.

Mr. DOUGHTON with Mr. WILSON of Illinois.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. GRAY of New Jersey.

Mr. HOWARD with Mr. MAGEE.

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. TINKHAM.

Mr. ROUSE with Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. GALLAGHER with Mr. LUFKIN.

Mr. POLK with Mr. DOWELL.

Mr. HAMILL with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

Mr. DOOLITTLE with Mr. SIEGEL.

Mr. LEA of California with Mr. SANFORD.

Mr. OLIVER of New York with Mr. SWITZER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Gentlemen, of course I knew it was going to take an hour or two hours, or possibly three hours, to get through with this, but I have spoken much longer than I intended and I have just reached the excess-profit tax, which I regard as the most important provision of this bill. The bill is quite long, and I have every one of the titles to explain in detail and to answer any questions that may be asked. It is possible that it may be wiser for the committee to rise.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was going to make the suggestion to the gentleman that he has been speaking for a very long time and I would suggest that the committee rise.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would not ask that if we had not got down to what we regard as the most important and essential part of the bill and the one that probably will be more attacked than any other. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent for leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of my work in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of his work in Congress. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address which I delivered at the Ohio State Bankers' Association meeting at Columbus on Wednesday night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech that he recently made to the bankers' convention at Columbus, Ohio. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the record of my patriotic services both in and out of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on his patriotic services both in the House and out. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire to what extent the gentleman is going to treat his patriotic services outside of the House and outside of Congress?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I will state to the gentleman that I have performed distinguished patriotic services as a Red Cross and liberty loan speaker and in circulating patriotic literature and various other things.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If it is confined to those things. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, September 7, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12769) relative to fees for claim agents, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 771), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MILLER of Washington: A bill (H. R. 12890) for increasing the efficiency of Navy bands; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. McFADDEN: A bill (H. R. 12891) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, as amended August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1913, September 7, 1916, and June 21, 1917; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ELLIOTT: A bill (H. R. 12892) granting a pension to Fannie M. McQuade; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12893) granting a pension to George E. Lovin; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 12894) granting an increase of pension to George A. P. Cumming; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TILLMAN: A bill (H. R. 12895) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Peters; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of Mrs. Francis M. Bacon, chairman National Civic Federation, in support of the Keating bill (H. R. 12767); to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: Petition of sundry citizens of Toledo, Ohio, against the proposed war tax on automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SNYDER: Petition of the Sherman Sales Co., Utica, N. Y., protesting against the proposed discriminatory war tax on automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 7, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let Thy Spirit, Eternal God our Heavenly Father, possess our souls and arouse all the latent forces for good within us; that the better angels of our nature may lead on to great thoughts and great deeds; that the effusion of blood may cease; war be forever banished from the earth; that the energy dissipated in it may be put to higher and nobler purposes; that hell may be turned into Heaven for all Thy children; in the name of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE (H. DOC. NO. 1272).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy in response to the Madden resolution, House resolution 390, as to departmental employees liable to military service, which under the previous order of the House is to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The communication is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, September 6, 1918.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In response to House of Representatives resolution No. 390, I beg to transmit herewith letter dated August 26, submitted by the Major General Commandant, United States Marine Corps, inclosing a list of men who on June 5, 1917, were between the ages of 21 and 31 years and who, since that date, have been commissioned or enlisted in and assigned to clerical work under the United States Marine Corps and not employed in active or field operations.

As rapidly as possible men within the draft age who are qualified for active field service are being replaced with women clerks who are being enrolled in the Marine Corps Reserve.

Very truly, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS,
Washington, August 26, 1918.

From: The Major General Commandant.
To: The Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: House of Representatives resolution No. 390.

1. In compliance with reference (a) there is inclosed herewith the report requested for the United States Marine Corps.

2. This report contains the names of 202 men, this figure being approximately thirty-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the total enlisted strength of the Marine Corps.

3. For many of the men whose names appear on the attached report it was necessary to obtain from the Surgeon General of the Navy a waiver of physical defects before enrollment could be made. In most cases these physical defects are such that the subjects are incapacitated for active field service.

4. A few of the men whose names appear on the attached list had been placed in a deferred classification by their local boards before enrollment, but received further deferred classification automatically upon enrollment. The majority of them, however, had not been classified by their local boards at the time of their enrollment, and the majority of this class would undoubtedly have been placed in deferred classes on account of physical defects, dependents, etc.

5. This report is made as of July 1, 1918.

6. Steps are now being taken to replace as rapidly as possible men within the draft age who are qualified for active field service with women clerks who are being enrolled in the Marine Corps Reserve.

GEORGE BARNETT,

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to the House of Representatives the number of men (with the name and home address of each) who, on June 5, 1917, were between the ages of 21 and 31 years, and who since that date have been commissioned or enlisted either in the active or in any of the Reserve Forces of the Military or Naval Establishments and assigned to clerical work in their respective departments, or in offices elsewhere, where such service is not directly rendered to and as a part of units of the Army and Navy employed in active or field operations, and who have received deferred classification by reason of being already in the military or naval service of the United States."

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

The Committee on Enrolled Bills report that this day they presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 325. Joint resolution amending section 8 of the amendment to the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. GORE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. FRANCE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that Mr. HITCHCOCK was excused, on his own request, from further service as a conferee on the bill (H. R. 11283) entitled "An act to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes," and Mr. POMERENE was appointed in his place.

PROHIBITION IN ESTABLISHED WAR-PLANT ZONES.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 172, authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquor can not be sold.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this joint resolution, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Is the resolution subject to amendment if unanimous consent is given?

The SPEAKER. If unanimous consent is given it will be subject to amendment like any other resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question. This resolution includes munition factories, but it makes no reference to the colleges and institutions where young student officers are going to be instructed. Would it be objectionable to the committee to insert college and educational institutions where our boys are to be sent?

Mr. WEBB. I do not remember the wording of the law that makes it a crime to sell liquor within 5 miles of where soldiers are encamped, but my belief is that the present law would cover it.

Mr. BORLAND. No; it will not. That law applies to a military camp, and the Attorney General has ruled that to be a military camp it must have at least 250 men barracked there for a term exceeding 30 days. If the men are not actually quartered on the premises it is not a camp within the present 5-mile-zone law.

Mr. WEBB. My information is that students will be quartered around the college, but even if that is not so I do not think this amendment ought to be put on at this time. There is very urgent need for the bill with reference to munition plants.

Mr. BORLAND. I realize that and I have no disposition to delay the resolution. I am strongly in favor of it, but I think we ought to throw some safeguard around these institutions and colleges.

Mr. WEBB. I think so, too——

Mr. BORLAND. I will not delay the passage of the resolution by offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DYER. I reserve the right to object. The President has stated to the Congress in the joint session that he is very anxious to have this revenue bill passed as speedily as possible at this session. This bill or any other bill ought not to interfere with the revenue legislation, and for that reason I object.

REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 235, nays 0, answered "present" 2, not voting 193, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. OLNEY with Mr. WARD.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. BROWNE.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY with Miss RANKIN.

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. EAGAN with Mr. PARKER of New York.

Mr. GALLIVAN with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. WILSON of Texas with Mr. FARR.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BROWNING.

Mr. HENSLEY with Mr. MUDD.

Mr. PADGETT with Mr. HICKS.

Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. DOOLITTLE with Mr. SIEGEL.
Mr. LEA of California with Mr. SANFORD.
Mr. OLIVER of New York with Mr. SWITZER.
Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana with Mr. BACHARACH.
Mr. SCULLY with Mr. STRONG.
Mr. STEELE with Mr. BUTLER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the food-production bill, H. R. 11945, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. LEVER. Then I ask that the bill be sent to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. I ask that at the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] on Monday or Tuesday, whenever he makes it, the Agricultural appropriation bill may be in order; that the debate shall be limited on that bill to an hour and 30 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and 30 minutes by myself; and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to make any such indefinite agreement as that. We do not know when the gentleman from Michigan will finish his speech or what may happen between now and Tuesday.

Mr. CANNON. I have received a number of telegrams about the Gore amendment. I do not know what is in this bill.

The SPEAKER. What bill is this?

Mr. LEVER. This is the regular Agricultural appropriation bill, which was vetoed by the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] objects.

Mr. WALSH. If there is any attempt made while I am present to take up this bill before the completion of the revenue bill I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. [Laughter.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, September 9, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 772), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. TINKHAM: A bill (H. R. 12896) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia," approved February 4, 1913; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 12897) to establish the "star of service" flag and emblems to be placed thereon for persons in the military or naval service of the United States in the present war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOON: A bill (H. R. 12898) providing for the protection of the users of the telephone and telegraph service and the properties and funds belonging thereto during government operation and control; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 12899) to provide for the construction of a dam and headgate for the Le Claire or Riverton No. 2 ditch; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: Resolution (H. Res. 427) providing for an investigation of "profiteering" in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. WEBB: Resolution (H. Res. 428) for the immediate consideration of Senate joint resolution 172; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALEXANDER: A bill (H. R. 12900) granting a pension to Thomas Alley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 12901) granting an increase of pension to Louis Sickenberger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GILLETT: A bill (H. R. 12902) granting a pension to William Thornton Parker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. IRELAND: A bill (H. R. 12903) granting an increase of pension to Joseph H. Munroe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TINKHAM: A bill (H. R. 12904) granting an increase of pension to Cornelius Regan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12905) to correct the military record of James Regan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Papers to accompany House bill 12894, granting an increase of pension to George A. P. Cumming; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GILLETT: Petition of the city government of Springfield, Mass., for the continuing in effect throughout the entire year of the present standard time, as provided by the daylight-saving law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LOBECK: Petition of D. A. Compton and 67 others, residing in the second district of Nebraska, indorsing national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions of 30 members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and 27 others, and of C. M. Foreman and 115 others, all from the second congressional district of Nebraska, favoring prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petition of Oliver W. Delaney and 531 other citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., in favor of the enactment of the Edmonds bill (H. R. 5531) to provide for a pharmaceutical corps in the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of H. L. Owesney and 9 other citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., protesting against the passage of a discriminatory war tax on automobiles as recommended by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 9, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our fathers have told us of old of the sufficiency of Thy grace and Thy power. Thou hast ever been upon the side of right, and right has within it all of human happiness and human progress and human success. We are committing our way into Thy hands, praying Thee to guide us as Thou hast guided our fathers, that Thou wilt lead us into the paths of usefulness, that Thou wilt give to us victory in all our enterprises for the uplift of humanity, and that Thou wilt qualify us for the tasks of the day. Refine and bless our spirit life by Thine own gift of Thy Spirit to us, that we may be ever mindful of Thy law and Thy purpose, and work out God's great destiny for us as a nation. We pray Thee to this end bless us this day and guide us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. VARDAMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2180) to approve mutual cessions of territory by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota and the consequent changes in the boundary line between said States, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of Local Grange No. 210, Patrons of Husbandry, of Trout Lake, Wash., and a petition of Local Grange No. 322, Patrons of Husbandry, of Happy Valley, Wash., praying that additional taxes be placed upon excessive incomes, war profits, and luxuries, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Pomona Grange No. 32, Patrons of Husbandry, of West Klickitat, Wash., praying for Federal control of the packing industries, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. RANSDELL. I send to the desk a copy of an act of the Legislature of Louisiana memorializing Congress in regard to woman suffrage. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA.

I, the undersigned assistant secretary of state of the State of Louisiana, do hereby certify that the annexed and following three pages contain a true and correct copy of act No. 10 of the session acts of the extra session of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana for the year 1918, approved in part August 15, 1918, as is shown by comparison with the original on file and of record in the archives of this office.

Given under my signature, authenticated with the impress of my seal of office, at the city of Baton Rouge, this 29th day of August, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.]

R. H. FLOWER,
Assistant Secretary of State.

[Act No. 10, house concurrent resolution No. 9, by Mr. Stewart.]

Whereas under a government existing and exercising its authority by votes of the people it is obvious that whatsoever power shall declare who shall vote will control that government; and

Whereas if a people shall themselves declare who among them shall exercise the franchise they are free, and if external power shall control that privilege they are not free; and

Whereas in the formation of this Union by the several States under the Federal Constitution this vital political principle was solemnly recognized and guaranteed as applicable to each separate State for reasons appertaining to the origin of their population, their homogeneity, their existing forms of local government, their wide separation, differences of climate and forms of life and activity, all of which reasons exist to-day and will forever endure; and

Whereas never but once since the formation of this Government has this principle been violated, and then only in the passionate bitterness following civil war, when normal judgment and justice had been stricken down, and when a great section of the Union, though most affected by the change, was permitted no voice therein; and

Whereas this grievous error, perpetuated in the fifteenth amendment, has curtailed the free flow of the energies of the white race of the South, circumscribed their effort for progress, restricted their genius for government, and denied to them the free development allowed to their brethren elsewhere in the Union; and

Whereas this first violation of State integrity has injuriously affected the political liberty and material welfare of only one section of the Nation, it is only too clear a guide what will happen to the whole people when State government is destroyed, the Union becomes an empire, controlled, dominated, and governed by one section, as Germany by Prussia, the laws made at one place in ignorance and indifference to the local well-being of those in another too distant to influence their making; and

Whereas there is presently pending before the Senate of the United State in the so-called Susan B. Anthony amendment a measure designed as a second attack upon State control of its own electorate, which measure not only accentuates the evil already committed and condones the fraud in the commission but which will pave the way for further Federal control of State electorates, to the final destruction of the liberties of the people; and

Whereas the blood and treasure of the people is being justly and freely poured out to make the world safe for democracy, which great principle applies to an American State as well as to a European State; and

Whereas this principle is boldly violated in this Federal attempt to impose franchise laws on the States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the people of Louisiana (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to reject the so-called Miss Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Federal Constitution, requiring each State to grant suffrage to the female sex, without choice or limitation, and authorizing Federal power to enforce the amendment, the said Congress of the United States to declare by this action that the democracy of each separate American State is safe against the force and power of a combination of other American States; and be it further

Resolved, That we call upon our sister States of the Union to likewise declare for State integrity and the safety of American democracy and vigorously oppose Federal interference or control with State franchises; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each House of Congress in the United States.

HEWITT BOUANCHAUD,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
FERNAND MOUTON,
Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.

Not agreeing with some of the preliminary statements in the foregoing expression of the general assembly, I approve only that portion thereof which contains the resolution.

August 15, 1918.

R. G. PLEASANT,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the war service committee on brick, district No. 17, of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on brick, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of T. B. Walker, of Minneapolis, Minn., relative to the pending war-revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 4855) to amend an act approved April 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4272) for the relief of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (Rept. No. 563); and

A bill (S. 4271) for the relief of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (Rept. No. 564).

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1787) for the relief of Thomas Mulvey, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. STERLING introduced a bill (S. 4918) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain described lands to the city of Watertown, State of South Dakota, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

STREET CAR SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 298), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Public Utilities Commission for the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, directed to give the Senate the following information:

First. Have any orders been issued by the commission requiring the street car companies of the District of Columbia to procure more cars for use upon existing lines in the District, and, if so, to transmit to the Senate copies of such orders, and, if no such orders have been issued, to inform the Senate why this has not been done.

Second. Has any investigation been made by the commission to determine how many more cars could be used advantageously by such companies on existing tracks? If so, what does such investigation show? If such investigation has not been made, why has it not been done?

Third. Why have not more cars been secured by said companies?

Fourth. When are additional new cars likely to be placed in service?

Fifth. What efforts has the commission made to assist the companies in securing additional cars?

Sixth. Why is not more frequent service required by the commission?

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Kellogg	Nugent	Smoot
Bankhead	Kenyon	Overman	Sterling
Benet	King	Phelan	Thomas
Culberson	Kirby	Poindexter	Trammell
Fletcher	Knox	Pomerene	Vardaman
Gore	McCumber	Ransdell	Walsh
Guion	McNary	Shafroth	Warren
Henderson	Martin	Sheppard	Wilfley
Jones, N. Mex.	Myers	Sherman
Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. NEW, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. FRANCE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent on official business

Mr. BORAH, Mr. BAIRD, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. GERRY, and Mr. FALL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. SIMMONS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 300), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk, at the rate of $150 per month, for a period lasting from September 14, 1918, until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—CHARLES DOHR.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Washington, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers accompanying the bill (S. 3243, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session) granting a pension to Charles Dohr, no adverse report having been made thereon.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MARTIN. The senior Senator from Arkansas (Mr. ROBINSON) has requested that he be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] be assigned to membership upon the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on the 30th ultimo, approved and signed the act (S. 4527) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

REPORT OF DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS (S. DOC. NO. 275).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, on motion of Mr. SMOOT was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Director General of Railroads of the work of the United States Railroad Administration for the first seven months of its existence ended July 31, 1918.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 9 September, 1918.

FRANCHISES OF PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 274).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 38 of the act approved March 2, 1917 (39 Stat., 951), entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of six franchises granted by the Public Service Commission of Porto Rico. The copies of the franchises inclosed are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War transmitting them to me.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 9 September, 1918.

PAY OF CAPTURED OFFICERS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to an item which appeared in the New York Herald, Paris edition, and I should like to ask some member of the Military Affairs Committee if the information here given is correct. It says:

NO PAY ALLOTMENT FOR AMERICANS IF THEY ARE CAPTURED—WAR DEPARTMENT TAKES STAND THAT GOVERNMENT HOLDING PRISONERS MUST ASSUME WAGE OBLIGATIONS.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday.

Wives, parents, and dependents of officers who have been captured by the Germans have been notified by the War Department that the Government can no longer pay them their allotments.

The department holds that with the capture of an officer the obligation to pay his salary passes, under international law, to the government which holds him.

I should like to inquire of some member of the Military Affairs Committee if they know what the status of the family of a captured captain is under the rules and regulations of the War Department with reference to allotments?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not see the chairman of the committee here.

Mr. BORAH. I would be glad to have the view of the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I know nothing about the particular subject to which the Senator refers, but I do not believe that condition can be possible. I hope not.

Mr. BORAH. It occurred to me that it was a most extraordinary condition of affairs if it was true.

Mr. SMOOT. The only way that it could possibly be true under existing law is for our Government to construe a capture as taking a soldier out of the Army, because the law specifically provides that all privates in the Army shall be entitled to a fixed compensation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not believe I can impart any information as a member of the Military Affairs Committee, because this reported condition is an entirely new one so far as I have heard; but I presume that if there is a situation over there in Germany that has caused a stoppage of pay to Army officers and allotments to their families it is because foreign countries are paying full salaries to the officers and men in captivity, and, if so, I do not see that they could pay allotments here in addition. I think that is a strained situation and if the report be true early action seems necessary.

Mr. BORAH. This assumes that the German Government is going to do the right thing by our captured citizens.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator speaks of captured citizens. He means captured Army officers?

Mr. BORAH. Well, they are citizens.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand the law, Germany is to pay the salaries of officers and men imprisoned and we pay the corresponding officers of that country who are our prisoners. I do not claim to be an expert in international law, but I do understand that payments are made in that way. I presume in the final settlement that will be the situation. If it be true, as the Senator states, the matter ought to have immediate attention.

Mr. BORAH. The question with me is, What becomes of the wives and dependents during the long period of the war if they are to get nothing except that which the German Government gives to captured officers? Are we going to leave these families to the fate of time and the Hohenzollern conception of international honor? We have a duty to perform toward them.

Mr. SMOOT. When the Senator referred to the article I thought it had reference to private soldiers, and therefore I spoke as I did with reference to the existing law. As I understand it, the interned German officers who are now held by the United States at Fort Douglas, Utah, are paid by the United States the same compensation that an officer of similar rank in the United States Army is paid, and in such cases German officers are drawing to-day nearly four times the amount that they would draw if they were in the German Army. I am told that our Government under international law is paying the interned German officers now in the bull pen at Fort Douglas, Utah.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we were engaged in a war with a nation which observed the rules of international law, we would be able to proceed upon the precedent which it is claimed is embodied in international law or conventions in regard to the matter; but we certainly can not permit the wives and dependents of American officers to rely upon the German Government for their sustenance or support during this war, because we are not carrying on a war with that kind of a nation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator from Idaho restate the purport of the article? I did not quite get it.

Mr. BORAH. I will do so. This is a dispatch from the Paris edition of the New York Herald:

Therefore the Imperial Government is supposed to pay the salaries of American officers captured by German troops and held in German prison camps.

So far no funds from the German Government have been received by dependents of captured officers.

The point which interests me is knowing as we do what the German Government will do about it, does the American Republic propose to leave these dependents and wives solely to the mercy of what the German Government does do? I think we ought to take action in regard to it. I do not know just what has been done or what policy has been adopted. My object in raising the question was to find out, if I might, from the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that I received a letter this morning from an officer at the front inclosing this clipping to me, and I intended to make inquiry along the line suggested by the Senator from Idaho. If this is according to international law we ought to be able to ascertain whether Germany, as a matter of fact, is complying with that international law in that respect, because there have been captured officers for a good long while. I should like to know whether it is the case or not, because if it is we ought to take some action very promptly.

Mr. BORAH. We know, Mr. President, that Germany will not observe any rules of international law during this conflict.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is true; but, as a matter of fact, it may be shown that she has been observing this rule. I do not know. I should be surprised if she has been observing it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that it is very doubtful whether or not this is international law. I do not myself think it is. I think an attempt was made at one time to make a convention on that subject. I think it was a part of one Hague convention, that it was desired that the civilized nations of the world should come to such an understanding. Whether or not such an understanding has ever been reached, I do not know. I think it would be important to know what the present practice is, whether Germany, as a matter of fact, is actually paying those officers their salaries, and what are we doing reciprocally, whether we are paying their salaries to the German officers whom we have captured. That matter has not been made a subject of convention. If that convention has not been put into practice, of course, as the Senator from Idaho has intimated, some relief ought to be granted to the wives and children of such officers who have been captured by the Germans.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if he has heard of any instance where there has come complaint from officers' families on this subject?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I have a letter here now in regard to that matter.

Mr. WARREN. That is, anticipating that such is the fact or that such relief has already been denied?

Mr. BORAH. That they have already, as I understand the letter, ceased to receive their allotment.

Mr. WARREN. Then something ought to be done; the matter ought to have immediate attention.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Idaho whether the same principle will apply to enlisted men as to allotments to their dependents?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know. The article which I have in my hand does not cover enlisted men.

Mr. NELSON. If enlisted men are in the same situation, they also should be taken care of.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that this is a principle of international law, but I have seen it so stated. I did not investigate that, because whether it is or not it is immaterial to me. I know that Germany, in all probability, would not comply with it, even if it were a principle of international law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Idaho claims that the international understanding is that an imprisoned officer shall receive the same salary which he was receiving from his own Government or the same salary that a like officer would receive from the nation in which he is incarcerated?

Mr. BORAH. I am not making any claim in regard to that at all. The point which I am seeking to impress upon the mind of the Senate is that the wives and dependents of the officers who have been captured may be denied any further assistance.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know, but it was stated by the Senator from Utah that the officers who are held prisoners here are receiving about four times the salary which they would receive had they remained in Germany. My understanding has been that they were simply given the same salary that was paid them by Germany, and not the salary of like officers in the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Apropos of what the Senator from North Dakota has just stated, one of the officers of our own Army advised me with respect to German officers that had been captured and were interned here, that under a convention to which our Government and Germany were parties, as I understood him, the rule was that the captured officers were to receive the same compensation which was paid to officers of like grade and standing in the army of the country capturing them. Therefore the German officers who were interned at Fort Douglas, in Utah, would receive the same compensation that our officers would receive, whereas our officers captured in Germany would only receive the compensation that German officers receive.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would be about one-fourth of what we would be paying to like German officers.

Mr. KING. That is the convention that existed between the two Governments.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that ought to be repudiated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I rose to ask the Military Affairs Committee to give some consideration to the question. The salaries of officers can be adjusted after the termination of the war, but the condition of their wives and dependents must be adjusted now. We ought to take care of them and not leave them to the mercy of the German Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My understanding is, though it is not very valuable, that under this treaty it is simply a question of salaries that is discussed and not as to the distribution of the salaries among the dependents. I do not imagine, even if the convention is absolute, that Germany would look after the distribution of the salaries among the dependents. We provide for that in our law. So it occurs to me that the Senator's inquiry is most pertinent at present, and that the matter ought to be looked into.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me suggest to the Senator that he embody the view that he has in mind in the shape of a resolution, which the Senate can refer to the Committee on Military Affairs, or I should say, perhaps, propose a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of War for information about this subject, so that the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Foreign Relations—one or the other—may expedite this matter so that summary relief may be afforded the wives in the condition which has been described.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be very glad to formulate such a resolution, but it occurred to me that possibly the Military Affairs Committee might be in possession of the information which I desire, and even without a resolution might be disposed to inquire into the matter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4855, just reported by me from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is in violation of the rule. There is a rule providing that every Monday morning, immediately upon the close of morning business, the calendar shall be called—a new rule which was adopted on the 2d day of July last.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, has morning business closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12462) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall have to object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has heretofore ruled on this question. The Senate made a rule over a month ago that a Senator could not make any such motion as is now made by the Senator from Oklahoma, but that immediately upon the close of morning business the Senate should consider the calendar.

Mr. GORE. And that rule applies on Monday morning?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is Monday morning and the rule applies.

CONSUMPTION AND PRODUCTION OF GASOLINE.

Mr. SMOOT. On behalf of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 299), as follows:

Resolved, That the Fuel Administrator be directed to inform the Senate what, approximately, is the daily consumption and production of gasoline in the United States, how much is taken for export, and what surplus, if any, there is of gasoline.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have no objection to the resolution, but, under the rules, I understand that can not be done on Monday morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; this is morning business.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg pardon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if he will not include another inquiry, namely, as to what proportion of the gasoline is used in pleasure cars? We ought to be informed of that fact.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he will not address a separate resolution to that inquiry? The Senator from Massachusetts desires this information as quickly as possible, for a certain purpose, and I am afraid that, if the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota were added to this resolution, it would take a long time to secure the information. I therefore suggest to the Senator that he offer a separate resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us hear the resolution read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, at the suggestion of the Senator from Utah I shall not press my request, but I certainly can see no reason why we can not get one part of this information as easily as the other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to report a disagreement on the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes, and to move that the conferees be instructed to confer further with the conferees of the House. I should like in explanation to say that this bill, sometimes called the Phelan bill, proposes to give certain limited trust power to the national banks where States give such powers to State banks in competition with the national banks. I do not feel justified in agreeing to that proposal without the Senate having been informed with regard to it. I am advised that the opposition that existed to giving the trust powers proposed in that bill to the national banks has been satisfied, and that the parties objecting to it have become convinced that it would not be injurious, as they anticipated; but I think the matter ought to be presented to the Senate, so that the Senate will be advised with regard to it before the conferees take any action about it, and so that if the Senate desires to consider that aspect they may have the opportunity of doing so before the Senate conferees agree to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be no report.

Mr. OWEN. There is no report, except of progress. I did not intend to make a formal report, but only to advise the Senate of the fact.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Oklahoma. He submitted what purports to be an intended conference agreement on the subject of authorizing national banks to transact a trust business under the so-called Phelan bill, a bill taking its name from a Representative from Massachusetts in the House of Representatives. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, whether the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve Board approve of the new power proposed to be granted the national banks?

Mr. OWEN. It is my understanding, Mr. President, that they do. I merely reported progress with regard to this matter, not feeling willing to acquiesce in the trust provisions which were contained in the bill without the Senate being previously advised with regard to them, so that they might, if they desired to do so, discuss the matter, because in presenting the bill to the Senate all that part was stricken out by the Committee on Banking and Currency for the purpose of avoiding controversy over that feature, there being other parts of the bill which required prompt action. Personally I think that the trust privilege ought to be granted, because in some instances the national banks are subject to a serious handicap because of the competition of State banks, and I think it desirable that the banks should be upon the same basis, so that when they do compete with each other they may compete upon fair terms.

NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. When is the time to submit a motion to discharge a committee from the further consideration of a bill? Is that in order at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would say that, in his opinion, a motion to discharge a committee would come under the head of reports of committees.

Mr. KENYON. I submit the motion which I send to the desk, and, if it is in order, I ask that it be agreed to. I think there will be no discussion of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the motion submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. KENYON moves that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 121, creating a commission to report a plan for the adoption of a national budget.

Mr. KENYON. I will say that I have spoken to the chairman of the Committee on appropriations in relation to the matter, and he has no objection. It is a resolution creating a commission to report a plan for the adoption of a national budget system. The committee has had the joint resolution since January, 1918, and there is no chance of any consideration of it by the committee. I should like to have it placed on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the motion? The Chair hears none, and the motion is agreed to. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

NOONDAY PRAYER.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, during the recess of the Senate certain strictures have been made upon a resolution (S. J. Res. 164) adopted by this body calling upon the President to proclaim a noonday hour of prayer to God for the safety of our troops and the success of our arms. I would not have called the attention of the Senate to the matter were it not for the fact that I have received a letter from the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, which clearly indicates to me, as do articles in the religious press, and particularly in the Christian Science Monitor, that there is a radical misunderstanding of the nature of the resolution and the action of the Senate. Therefore, without further comment, I should like the letter from this branch of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics and my brief reply printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEAR SIR: Gen. John A. Sutter Council, No. 26, Junior Order United American Mechanics, in regular meeting assembled, July 25, 1918, by unanimous vote went on record as unalterably opposed to the contemplated action of Congress on Senate joint resolution No. 164, requesting the President to issue a proclamation for daily prayer, for the reason that the proposed resolution directs that the President shall propose the Angelus as the prayer to be offered.

We are opposed to sectarian legislation.

This membership believes in prayer, but they believe that a national movement to this end should not be limited by any prescriptions. We respectfully and earnestly ask you to use your influence and to vote against this resolution.

B. F. ROUSE,
Recording Secretary.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1918.

Mr. B. F. ROUSE,
Recording Secretary Gen. John A. Sutter, No. 26,
Junior Order United American Mechanics,
Sacramento, Cal.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter calling my attention to the resolution of your council, dated July 25, 1918, opposing Senate joint resolution 164, which states that it is a request to the President to issue a proclamation for daily prayer, "for the reason that the proposed resolution directs that the President propose the Angelus as the prayer to be offered."

If this were true, it would be, as you state, sectarian legislation, to which I am unalterably opposed. You say your "membership believes in prayer," and if so, you would probably be in favor of the resolution, which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to commend by proclamation to the people of the United States, observance in their homes and elsewhere, until the end of the war, of the practice of prayer for at least one minute at noon each day to God for victory for our cause in the existing war."

It is true some misinformed people have confounded this request with the Angelus, which is a Roman Catholic prayer, but such was neither contemplated nor expressed in the resolution. In the preamble, however, the following words occur:

"Whereas what is called "the Angelus," the practice of prayer for one minute at noon each day, for the success of our country in the existing war is being observed in the District of Columbia and some other parts of the United States."

Now, if it is true that the practice of prayer for one minute each day is called "the Angelus," it is a popular misapprehension. It is certain, however, that the request made to the President by the Senate called for a prayer to God, which is not the Angelus, and one in which people of all religions can indulge. It is of the same character as the Thanksgiving Day proclamation or the prayer offered in the Senate of the United States from time immemorial every day at noon by the official Chaplain.

I am sorry that the intent and even the language of the resolution has been misunderstood.

Yours, very truly, JAMES D. PHELAN.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The first business on the calendar was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) to appropriate $3,000,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to prosecute the work of eradicating the southern cattle tick.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) authorizing the President to appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1725) to stimulate the production of food upon private and public lands within reclamation projects, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, allow that bill to be read first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, do I understand that objection has been made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection was made, and, under Rule VIII, the bill goes over.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask who made the objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in order to ascertain whether or not I clearly understand the rule, if objection should be made, a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill would be in order, would it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it is in order.

The resolution (S. Res. 91) extending the authority of and provision for the committee appointed under S. Res. 92, Sixty-third Congress, first session, to investigate the charges of alleged attempts to influence legislation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) providing for the appointment of a joint committee to be known as the joint committee on the conduct of the war was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the joint resolution go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 10) authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to investigate the causes of the recent riots in East St. Louis, Ill., and to report thereon, was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President without the intervention of the electoral college, establishing their term of office from the third Tuesday of January following their election, and fixing the time when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, this joint resolution has been on the calendar for some time. I recognize that there would not be any proper opportunity here now to discuss its provisions. I want to give notice, however, that when there is more time I expect to call up the joint resolution for consideration. I wish to have sufficient time to have it properly considered.

The bill (S. 23) granting to the State of Nevada 7,000,000 acres of land in said State for the use and benefit of the public schools of Nevada and the State univerity of the State of Nevada, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, on page 1, line 13, before the word "years," to strike out "six" and insert "eight," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE V.

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution when ratified within eight years from the date of their proposal by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, or by the electors in three-fourths thereof, as the mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain briefly the principal features of the joint resolution with this amendment as compared with the way it now stands. In other words, what is the difference between the two?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as the Constitution is now, when an amendment is submitted to the people it can be submitted for a thousand years and be in force whenever ratified. This limits to eight years the time within which the constitutional amendment shall be agreed upon.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that we can not, under the five-minute rule, properly discuss this matter.

Mr. WALSH. I object to its consideration, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I propose to object for that reason—because we will not have time to consider a constitutional amendment under the five-minute rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 3311) to increase and expedite the supply of munitions of war was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when that bill was up for consideration the last time, the chairman of the committee asked me to object to its present consideration, either because there were some matters that had been passed by Congress that covered it or because there were some amendments that he desired to offer to the bill. For that reason I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1795) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The bill (S. 3522) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 3 of title 1 of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 3. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies, or with intent to obstruct the sale by the United States of bonds or other securities of the United States or the making of loans by or to the United States, and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 951) to provide for the sinking of artesian wells, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 758) to increase the productive agricultural area of the United States by the reclamation of arid and swamp lands was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN.

The bill (S. 3439) for the relief of certain homestead and desert-land entrymen was announced as next in order.

Mr. LENROOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read, and I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes seem to have it.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a division.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, my colleague asked that the bill be read for the information of the Senate. I ask, likewise, that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been read, and the committee amendments have been agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. That was on a day months ago. I ask that it be read again now, when the Senate is present and can learn what it is about.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the reading of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read the bill as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. MYERS. Is my motion debatable, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; not during this time. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask for a division.

On a division the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments have been agreed to heretofore.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement of two or three minutes about this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, let us pass it.

Mr. MYERS. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the measure is now open for debate, I take it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. For five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it does not seem possible that if the Senate understands the character of this bill it will approve of it. It practically repeals the present homestead law as far as residence is required. It shortens the term of residence required upon the homestead practically from three years to seven months. That is the effect and that is the purpose of the bill.

At this time, Mr. President, when increased production for war purposes is so necessary, it ought not to be possible that the Senate will permit the granting of a fee to a homestead entryman at the end of seven months, permitting him to mortgage his homestead and thus speculate in it. All that is required is an affidavit that will satisfy a local register or receiver that for two years following he will cultivate at least one-eighth of the land each year.

Mr. President, if that is war legislation, then we may as well stop making some of the appropriations that we have been making for the purpose of increasing food production in the United States.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will reply briefly to the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. The very object of this bill in its inception is to promote the increased production of food products on the homesteaded lands of the West. It is a war measure and is intended to increase our food supply. There are in Montana and other Western States thousands of homesteaders who are splendid men and women, loyal and patriotic citizens, who have the misfortune of being poor. They went to the West to make homes there and to link their fortunes to those of that great section of the country and engage in agricultural labor and production, but they are handicapped by being short of means. Many of them have no money with which to improve their farms, to buy teams and wagons and tools and implements, and with which to fence and cultivate their farms and put their land in crops. They are well meaning, but poor. They are worthy and deserving. Under the existing laws of the United States the land which they occupy, when they may get title to it, is exempt from any lien for a debt that was incurred before making final proof. The consequence is that they can not get credit. If they go to a store to get seed or supplies or agricultural tools or implements or go anywhere to buy horses or to get anything with which to carry on farming operations, as a rule they are denied credit, because the people from whom they seek credit know that if they extend credit to them they will have no lien on their lands after the making of final proof. So the poor people are practically helpless, except in so far as they can get credit personally on the strength of their personal integrity. Thousands of them are handicapped in their desire to get the means with which to carry on the cultivation of their lands and raise crops, and they can not do it to any great extent. Many have to leave their homesteads and go away and hire out for wages elsewhere, and their land as a result is but scantily cultivated and does not produce nearly the crops it would produce if cultivated to the fullest extent possible.

This measure would not affect the general homestead law. It would not repeal it. The general homestead law would remain as now. This bill simply applies to the homesteaders of the present time; those now on homesteads who have entered them as much as one year or more ago and have cultivated them and otherwise complied with the homestead laws for at least seven months. It applies only to the homesteader of to-day, and none other. It has no future application. When taken advantage of by those now on the land, the present crop of homesteaders, it will be functus officio.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. POMERENE. I notice that section 2 provides—

That no final proof shall be deemed sufficient and no patent hereunder shall issue until the entryman shall, by affidavit, bond, or otherwise, as required by the register and receiver, satisfy the register and receiver of the land office where final proof may be made that he will each year for the next succeeding two years cultivate and put in grain or other food crops one-eighth of the area of the homestead.

My question is this: Suppose he gives this reasonably satisfactory proof that he will do these things, but fails to do these things during the two succeeding years, what remedy, if any, will the Government have?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know that there is any. I do not believe many will fail. The overwhelming majority will be honest and will comply. If an occasional one should not, the Government would not be hurt. It wants settlers on the land.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What loss would the Government sustain even in that case?

Mr. MYERS. I think that is a sufficient answer to the question, What would be the loss to the Government?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's five minutes have expired.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] takes an erroneous view of this bill. It occurs to me that section 2 and section 3 protect the situation pretty well and that the bill is a meritorious one and ought to pass. Section 3 provides:

That no patentee hereunder shall have the power to convey by deed of conveyance or otherwise alienate any lands patented hereunder (except that he may mortgage it for a valuable consideration) within three years' time from the date of his entry.

As was said by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the object of this bill is to enable the homesteaders situated as they are to have some security, something in the way of an asset by which to enable them to get means to go forward and raise crops. Safeguards have been thrown around the matter, it seems to me, quite sufficient to prevent what you may call speculation in homesteads.

Mr. POMERENE. May I address the same question to the Senator from Idaho that I addressed to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. Section 2 provides:

That no final proof shall be deemed sufficient and no patent hereunder shall issue until the entryman shall, by affidavit, bond, or otherwise, as required by the register and receiver, satisfy the register and receiver of the land office where final proof may be made that he will each year for the next succeeding two years cultivate and put in grain or other food crops one-eighth of the area of the homestead.

That is practically a promise, and I am not questioning the good faith of the promise that he intends to do these things; but assume, for the sake of argument, that he does not do it. It may be that he has acted in good faith; it may be that he made his promise in good faith, but for reasons beyond his control he has not been able to carry out the promise. Ought there not to be some remedy on the part of the Government or the community?

Mr. BORAH. Section 2 requires, as I read it, twice as much cultivation as the homestead law does as it exists now. Of course if the particular condition of affairs should exist as suggested by the Senator from Ohio, I doubt if there would be any practical remedy; that is to say, that the Government would have no comeback in the matter in any way except such as it would have by virtue of the bond or the assurance which had been given, but the Government takes little risk under the limitations of section 3.

Let me say further, in answer to the Senator from Ohio, that very little injury will ever arise or very little fault be found with the record, in my judgment. There might be an instance now and then, but it would be very rare indeed that the Government would have any cause to complain. The people who go upon these homesteads in these days and undertake to make homes and reclaim the public lands are not very often speculators. That used to be to a considerable extent true, but it is no longer true. They are very rarely speculators, and when you take into consideration that they are not permitted to sell it, to deed it, or to convey it for three years, their interest is to improve it, and it is to their own interest to go forward and carry out this contract.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may make a suggestion, it seems to me that this in no respects distinguishes between the homesteader who might be acting in good faith and a man who was really acting in bad faith. I confess I am not familiar with the land laws, because we have not for many, many years had any public lands in Ohio, and I have not had occasion to inform myself especially upon the subject, but it does seem to me there ought to be some remedy here. It may be that it is provided in other land laws. I am not sure about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Idaho has expired.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Ohio, I would point out to him that the bill only provides for a limitation on the time of residence, and does not in any way change, as far as I can see, the responsibility as to the improvement and cultivation of the land. It is also true that the entryman making proof on this land would not be relieved from obligation until the final improvement and cultivation was made. As in other homestead entries, in those under the present law the protection of the Government is found in the possibility of contest on the land. Wherever there is any settlement there is that liability, and no entryman, I take it, would involve himself in that risk without serious danger of losing his homestead. I believe that of itself would guarantee good faith on the part of the entryman.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand, then, that if some of these entrymen were not to act in good faith, and did not cultivate as they promised to do and were required to do under section 2, the Government could contest their right to a title?

Mr. KENDRICK. The Government not only would have the right to contest the land, but any neighbor—anyone who desired to obtain possession of the land—and if an absence of good faith were proved they would simply forfeit their right to the land.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the bill provides—I am reading from line 3, at the beginning—

That any person who, as much as one year before the passage of this act, shall have made a valid homestead entry for not more than 320 acres of public land—

And so forth. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], who introduced the bill and from whose committee it comes, if he has any information as to how many people there are in that class, the number of homesteaders who could take advantage of the bill? I am in favor of the bill, but I should like to have information, if such information can be obtained, as to how many people would be legally eligible and qualified to make entries under this act?

Mr. MYERS. I am not prepared to state the exact number now, but there are many thousands of them. There are thousands of them in Montana and every other Western State.

I want to state further, while on my feet, in reply to the question asked a number of times by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], that I do not believe this law would be abused one time out of a thousand. While it might be abused one time out of a thousand, the great good that it would do in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand would far outweigh the little damages that might result from its abuse one time out of a thousand. Every law that is enacted is abused. The law against murder, the law against larceny, is abused. Bankrupt laws are abused. Laws of limitation and estoppel are abused. Every human-made law is subject to abuse; but if a good law, as this would be, much more good comes from it than damage from its abuse.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his answer, but I should like to know from him, as chairman of the Public Lands Committee, if he has any idea as to the number of persons who would be qualified under this act?

Mr. MYERS. No exact figures; but I would say at least 10,000. It may be there would be more. I know there would be many thousands. I will say that this bill was unanimously reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Lands. As amended by the committee, it is indorsed by the Interior Department. It would not interfere with the general homestead law in future. It merely provides that such homesteaders as may have as much as one year prior to the enactment of the law made their entries and may have lived on and cultivated their homesteads seven months may get the benefits of it. Then it will be all over and done with. It will have no future application. There are thousands of homesteaders in the Northwest whose crops were ruined by drought this year, and they are asking millions of dollars from the Federal Government in the way of direct appropriations from the Federal Treasury to get seed for next year. This would enable many of those unfortunate homesteaders to obtain credit and buy their own seed on the strength of their patents and thus save the United States from appropriating just that much. The Senators from the Western States want the enactment of this bill, and they should have it. All of the western Senators are for it, and I believe they know best the needs of the West and what is best for the West, and believe they can be trusted to do what is right and best in matters vitally affecting their own section. The West is hard hit this year by the awful blight of drought. It has laid a heavy hand of affliction on the West. Thousands of homesteaders, honest and worthy men and women, loyal and patriotic, are sick at heart and desperately discouraged at seeing their crops burnt up by drought. Their plight is desperate. They are poor. They have neither means, money, nor credit. They want to raise food crops to aid in the prosecution of the war, but they are unable to obtain seed. They are clamoring for Federal aid. Here is one way to give it to them. Give them title to their lands and let them raise their own finances and furnish their own seed. We need the food.

Mr. LENROOT. In line 17, page 2, after the word "land," I move to insert the words "or timber growing thereon."

Mr. MYERS. I have no objection to that. I think it is a good amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment of the committee was agreed to will be reconsidered, the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin agreed to, and the amendment as amended agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer the following amendment to section 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will have to move to reconsider.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That a failure to so cultivate and put in grain or other food crops said land as herein provided shall subject said patent to cancellation after hearing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, section 2 provides for double the amount of cultivation that is now required under the homestead law. If a man takes advantage of this law, he subjects his patent to cancellation if he does not do twice as much as he is required to do under the law, which, of course, will result in nobody taking advantage of this law at all. It kills the law. If the law simply provided for the same amount of cultivation as the old law, it would be a different proposition, but this law obligates him to do twice as much; and yet the amendment provides if he fails, through sickness or other cause, to do it his entire effort to get a homestead is naught and the entry canceled. Of course, the result of it is that it kills the law.

Mr. MYERS. May I say word in explanation?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think that the amendment should be adopted, because it would defeat utterly the very object of this measure, and I will show the Senator from Ohio why and how. The very object of this law is to enable a man who is on a piece of land as a homesteader and is complying with the law and who is able to produce, by affidavit, bond, or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the local land office officials who know the man, evidence that he is in good faith and intends to comply with the provisions of the measure, and that he will live up to the law to the best of his ability—it is intended to allow such a man, who is unfortunately poor in this world's goods, to get title to his land sooner than he would otherwise in order that he may go to a local bank or money lender and mortgage his land and get money with which to fence it, build on it, buy teams and wagons and tools and implements and seed and put it under cultivation to the full extent of his ability. If, however, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio should be adopted and put in the proposed law, any banker to whom the man may take his title will say, "Why, if through sickness or other misfortune or through miscalculation or something which you can not now foresee you do not comply to the uttermost with the very letter of this law, your patent will be canceled, and we will not lend you any money." No banker would take that risk. That would utterly prevent the man from obtaining any money. It would defeat the object of the bill, and I do not believe the amendment ought to be adopted. The very object of this bill is to give the honest and worthy homesteader, who is poor but acting in good faith, his patent at the end of one year after his entry of his land; give it to him now, while this awful war is on, while we need the food to win the war, so he can go to banks or other money lenders and pledge his land and borrow money with which to improve his land and put in crops. The object is to enable him to get money.

If we are going to make the bill so burdensome on homesteaders, so extreme in its requirements that it will be unworkable, we might as well not enact the bill at all. As I said, thousands of homesteaders in the Northwest were burned out this year by drought and are appealing to the Government to pay out millions of dollars to stake them for next year's crops. Let us make it so many of these people can prove up and borrow money on their land, upon their good faith, and their known reputation for complying with the law, and use their own money in buying seed and raising next year's crop and save the United States donating that much money to them from the Federal Treasury. If, however, you are going to fix it so that when a homesteader proves up he will have no title to his land, he will not be able to borrow a dollar on it and he will be no better off than now. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be defeated.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever to embarrass any of these entrymen; I realize what their hardships are; but I think there is such a thing as good faith toward the Government. Now, let us see what this argument is. Under the rule of law, as set down in section 2, a man promises to cultivate one-eighth of the land that he is taking as a homestead. He makes that promise in good faith, it may be, but it may be in bad faith.

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment there to state that if the local land officers have any doubt of the man's good faith they may require a bond of him?

Mr. POMERENE. Then, in my judgment, there ought to be inserted a provision requiring that. He makes this promise, and he gets certain property rights from the Government. Good faith toward the Government requires that he should keep his promise in the matter. If he fails to do so, then the Government ought to have some remedy as against him.

I go to a bank and I promise to pay $1,000 which I owe; I make the promise in good faith. If I do not keep the promise, the bank brings suit against me. I do not know of any difference in principle between a situation such as that and the getting of title to land on a promise that I will do something in the future when I do not do it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I recognize that the object which the Senator from Ohio is seeking to obtain has a foundation of justice, but the Senator now says that this law is being passed to enable a man to get some form of security, to use his homestead as an asset for security. You can not go to a bank and get a mortgage or get anybody to take a mortgage upon a homestead when the entire title is to be forfeited in case for any conceivable reason—sickness or anything else—a man fails to cultivate within 20 acres of what the Government has required.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, I do not care to adopt a hard and fast rule here, or anything of that kind, that is going to be harsh, but if I promise to cultivate one-eighth of the land and the Government says, "I will give it to you if you cultivate one-eighth of it," if I do not cultivate the one-eighth for some reason or other, it seems to me that the Government should be in a position where it could exercise its discretion as to what it is going to do.

This does not distinguish between a man who exercises good faith and a man who does not do so. It is true the register will inquire into these things, but he may be deceived about the matter. If he gives his O. K. and says, "I believe this man is exercising good faith," though he may not be, merely because the register gives his certificate to that effect the man is entitled to have title to his land. That is my objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POMERENE. I have concluded.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I suggested to the Senator from Ohio that probably the Senator from Wyoming did not accurately state the rule, and that, in order to reach what he was seeking to accomplish, it would be necessary to make the patent subject to cancellation; but I do not think the Senator from Ohio takes the right view of the matter.

This promise is really not exactly in the nature of a contract made between the homestead entryman and the Government, which the Government will endeavor to seek to enforce. The Government wants to get increased crop production; the entryman is quite willing to help get the increased crop production, but he can not cultivate a crop; he can not raise a crop unless he can raise money upon the credit of his homestead. That is what the Government is interested in. It simply wants him in good faith to undertake this work; it is not undertaking anything else except to promote the further cultivation of these homesteads.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Montana if he feels that the Government should have no protection here as against the man who may in fact be acting in bad faith?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not say so at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly not.

Mr. WALSH. The man who is acting in bad faith, of course, commits perjury when he says in bad faith that it is his purpose to cultivate; he subjects himself to prosecution and to incarceration in the penitentiary. That is not always a very satisfactory way of solving these matters; but this is an emergency. The usual rule is that in such a case a man does not get his patent until the expiration of three years, but we want to expedite cultivation, and we merely make this arrangement so that the man can get the money for the purpose of carrying on cultivation, and the Government also serves its purposes in that way.

Mr. POMERENE. I observe, with all due respect, that the fact that a man might be threatened with prosecution for perjury would not be very much of a deterrent. It would be next to impossible to convict a man of perjury when he has said, "I promise to do something in the future." How are you going to get into the internal recesses of his mind as to a thing in the future?

Mr. WALSH. I recognize that fact; and I did not intend to say that the provision was adequate at all; but the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio unquestionably would defeat the whole purpose of the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I should be very glad to have my amendment modified in such a way——

Mr. MYERS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me for just a minute. I should be very glad to have my amendment modified in such a way that it would not do any injustice to the entryman; but I do not want injustice to be done to the Government in this manner.

Mr. MYERS. I merely want to say to the Senator from Ohio that I do not believe his amendment is necessary, because under the law as the bill is now drawn, if a man should make final proof and then boldly and openly go off and leave the premises and never go back nor attempt to comply with the law, I think it would be such an evident piece of bad faith that his patent could be canceled under the law as it now stands; and there would be no need of this amendment in that event. If a man makes a fair, honest effort to comply with the law and does not succeed his patent should not be canceled.

Mr. POMERENE. That is only one instance. I should be very glad to accept such a modification of my amendment as will make it less drastic.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. POMERENE. I have finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has been very indulgent to Senators, but the Senate is acting under a rule which prevents Senators from speaking on a bill oftener than once or for more than five minutes.

Mr. FALL. But the Senator from New Mexico has not thus far had an opportunity to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that, and did not make the remark which he did to reflect on the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I presume, understands that to-day under the 320-acre homestead act, the entryman must live upon the land for three years, and during each 12-month period for 7 months continuously. He must also, in addition to residence, cultivate a certain acreage each year. The proposition now before the Senate is to do away in effect with two years' residence upon the land, but to require double cultivation for the last two years of the cultivation period; in other words, the entryman must, before he can take advantage of this law, have resided at least the seven-month consecutive period out of the one year upon his homestead; he must have cultivated the land which is required to be cultivated for one year, and must enter into an obligation that he will cultivate double the minimum amount required of him for the succeeding two years. He entering upon that obligation, the Government then issues him a patent, but requires him to satisfy the local land officer that he will continue the cultivation, simply relieving him of the necessity of residing upon the land in order that he may go somewhere else, probably for more than five months, to earn money with which to cultivate and improve the land as required by law.

Now, with reference to the forfeiture of the patent, unless there is a limitation on the time during which suit might be brought on account of fraud for the cancellation of the patent, there would always be a cloud over the title of any land patented under this act, and such a cloud would remain forever unless some limitation is provided.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I merely desire to ask the Senator a question. Is there not some statute of limitation now bearing upon a case of this kind?

Mr. FALL. I was going to say that in regard to fraud and cancellation for fraud—and there may be some question whether or not this would be considered fraud—five years' limitation after the issue of the patent is the rule, provided the land in the meantime has not gone into the hands of innocent parties for value, parties who are not cognizant of the fraud and not in collusion with the homestead entryman. So after five years the title can not be attacked, and, unless some similar limitation were placed in this proposal of the Senator from Ohio, I doubt whether that five-year period of limitation would apply.

I am thoroughly in favor of this bill, but I would very much prefer that instead of having a cancellation amendment adopted in this bill, the patent itself should not issue until one year's residence and three years' cultivation. That is really the purpose of the bill. Then there would be no cloud upon the title after patent has once issued, but for five years, at any rate, there would be a cloud upon the title if the Senator's amendment were adopted.

This bill does not apply to any entries which have been made in the last six months or which have not been made within the period of 12 months prior to the issue of patent. It does not apply to any new homestead entry. I may say to the Senator that I had my attention called recently to a condition of this character existing in some of the States: The railroads are very short, of course, of workmen, and have been going out into the country districts in the attempt to secure bridge workers and section men upon the roads. Some entrymen, constituents of mine, have requested me to take up, and I have taken up, with the Interior Department the proposition that they should be allowed to leave their homestead entries to do work upon any war necessity and to have credit on the time of residence required under the law according to the time expended in such work; in other words, they should be allowed to work on the railroads to earn money and get credit in that way.

I understand that the actual facts in the condition of affairs here sought to be relieved is that the rural-credit banks possibly will loan the money upon lands patented under this bill, but they certainly would not be justified in loaning that money or making advances to any of these entrymen were the amendment of the Senator from Ohio adopted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] said, as I understood him, that the purpose of this bill was to relieve entrymen from residence, but I call attention to the fact that the purpose that has been stated by the author is naturally to allow them to raise money to put in their crops. The vital feature of this bill is the power to mortgage.

I am very much surprised to hear Senators say that this amendment would kill the bill. Mr. President, it can not kill the bill unless it be taken for granted that the local banker, who knows the entryman, is of the opinion that the entryman is not in good faith in making the affidavit before the register and receiver that he will fulfill his promise in the way of cultivation of one-eighth of the land for two successive years. So far as the entryman is in good faith, when he goes to the local banker under the amendment adopted he will have protection, because in that kind of a case the bank can protect itself; the bank can protect its mortgage and can proceed itself, through the entryman, to comply with the conditions of one-eighth cultivation for each of two years; but with the amendment adopted the entrymen can not speculate; they can not make a promise to a register and then fail to keep it. The amendment will take care of the meritorious cases, if it be adopted, but it will shut out, as it ought to shut out, those who would take advantage of the law not in good faith, but for the purpose of getting title upon only one-third of the residence required under existing law and then selling the land through the means of a mortgage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) to amend section 14 of the food-control act by increasing the guaranteed minimum price of wheat for the crop of 1918 from $2 to $2.50 per bushel was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

SAN DIEGO (CAL.) WATER SUPPLY.

The bill (S. 3646) to grant rights of way over Government lands for reservoir purposes for the conservation and storage of water to be used by the city of San Diego, Cal., and adjacent communities was announced as next in order.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, this is a bill granting to the city of San Diego for a municipal supply and reservoir a right of way in the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation, about 36 miles from San Diego. There have been extensive hearings, and both the Agricultural and Interior Departments, as well as the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Cato Sells, have approved the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but I do want to say that I have protests from a great many California people against this bill. I am quite aware that the Senator from California knows more about the situation there than I do, but I have letters from the Spring Valley Irrigation District of La Mesa and about a dozen other organizations who claim that they are deeply interested in this bill and that their rights are involved in it. That may be true or it may not be true, but I am not going to encumber the RECORD with the petitions and the protests. They say that the Senator from California is mistaken in his attitude and in the position which he takes upon this bill, and that it will do a great many people in California grave injustice. I repeat, I am not familiar with the situation; but the Senator from California is a member of the Public Lands Committee and represents in part the State of California. I can only say what I have said, and then the Senator can say what he desires to say in answer to it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, protests have been made against this application, and the matter has been before the departments and Congress for several years. The letter of the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, accompanying the report, addressed to Hon SCOTT FERRIS, refers to these protestants, and speaks of a hearing which they were given in the winter of 1915–16 in Los Angeles. By a decision rendered in July, 1916, the protest of Messrs. Fletcher and Murray against the city's application was dismissed. The objection is from a private or quasi-public water company, which believes that the grant to the city of San Diego will diminish its supply. Of course, the only purpose for which the city wishes the water is the domestic use of it; and the city of San Diego is a populous and growing community. The other companies supply water largely for irrigation purposes to the productive lands in the neighborhood of San Diego.

The only objection that has been given consideration that I know of is the objection by Messrs. Fletcher and Murray, which has been dismissed. They represent the Cuyamaca Water Co., and they have water rights above the Indian reservation; so it is very hard to see how they can be possibly damaged by granting a reservoir right of way in the Indian reservation, which is lower down. The Indian reservation gets the residuary water; and the city of San Diego, by building a dam, will have a storage there after the Cuyamaca Water Co. has helped itself, pursuant to the exercise of its water rights.

There seems to be a general unanimity on the part of the officials of the department that the city of San Diego needs and requires and is entitled to this privilege. There are some Indians in the reservation; and the city of San Diego, in consideration of this grant, undertakes, without any limitation, to remove those Indians to lands which, I believe, have already been selected by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I believe there are 29 families that would have to be provided for.

I do not know of any other objection, except from the Cuyamaca Water Co. If there are other objections, I suppose they are all of the same character.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator desires, I can call attention to them at this time.

Mr. PHELAN. If there is any serious objection, I, of course, ought to be apprised of it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator does not object, I ask that the two telegrams which I send to the desk be read for the information of the Senate and for the information of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JUNE 2, 1918.

To Hon. WILLIAM R. WHEELER,
Army and Navy Club, Washington, D. C.:

We urge you to represent us before Congress in opposing San Diego's El Capitan bill until such time as the city council of San Diego gives reasonable assurance to us and the Cuyamaca Water Co. that they will back up the statements of their city attorney before Congress that San Diego would not oppose, but would encourage, construction of the Cuyamaca Water Co.'s diverting dams. Repeated attempts by conference and otherwise have been made to get the San Diego City Council to support the city attorney's representations, but all efforts have failed. When that assurance from San Diego City Council is secured we withdraw all opposition to House bill 10587, Senate bill 3646. You can not too strongly impress Congress that this is our only source of water supply for our present needs and future growth, while San Diego has many other sources of supply. Repeated attempts were made by city council and merchants' association of La Mesa to present this matter to Congressman KETTNER when here recently, but he avoided meeting us and has failed to answer our communication.

J. H. MALLERY,
President Board of Trustees City of La Mesa.
O. D. INNES,
President Board Trustees City of El Cajon.
J. H. HALLEY,
President La Mesa, Lemon Grove, and Spring Valley Irrigation District.
G. A. MACNEAL,
President Merchants' Association of La Mesa.
H. CULBERTSON,
President El Cajon Farm Bureau.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., June 2, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM R. WHEELER,
Army and Navy Club, Washington, D. C.:

Please notify chairman Public Lands and Indian Affairs Committees of House and Senate, also other interested Members, that the Cuyamaca Water Co. has just offered to sell its system to us, including building of at least one major dam on the San Diego River, at or near their present point of intake. The valuation of their present system and future development to be made by State authorities, the Cuyamaca Co. to accept our bonds in payment. Every indication sale will be consummated by voters of this district. Official representatives of the cities of La Mesa and El Cajon, also business associations in our district, by arrangement, met Secretary Lane May 23, Pasadena, and asked Government consent to construction by Cuyamaca Water Co. of major dam at or near diverting dam. We believe permit will be granted. Urge delay on San Diego's El Capitan bill until Secretary Lane returns. This is no longer a fight of city versus private corporation, but one San Diego versus other municipalities; also, unanimous back country trying to protect its only source of water supply for our future heritage.

LA MESA, LEMON GROVE, AND SPRING VALLEY IRRIGATION DISTRICT,
J. H. HALLEY, President.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, that is the very same company to which I have referred. Their case was heard by the department, and it was dismissed. They sent on their agent to the hearing before the Public Lands Committee. The city of San Diego was represented by its district attorney, Mr. Cosgrave; and after a full hearing the committee reported out this bill. I am disposed to think that these private parties are mistrustful of their own city, whose interest certainly is to develop agricultural districts adjoining. They have water rights above the proposed dam and, I believe, are protected, but evidently they do not wish the city to exercise its municipal functions and provide water for its own people. I am convinced that the community interest is with the application of the city of San Diego for a reservoir right of way.

Delays have been granted by the committee, keeping the district attorney here for over two months, with the hope that some compromise might be arranged between the city and the Cuyamaca Water Co. That postponement was granted at the request of the Cuyamaca Water Co. The city of San Diego positively refuses to have any dealings in the nature of a compromise with these parties, and has steadfastly held that position. I do not see that any wrong could be done to these parties by passing the bill; and if there is any doubt about it they will have their opportunity to be heard in the House and, possibly, before the conference committee on the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a bill identical with the original print of this bill, I believe, was introduced in the House and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, of which I was then a member. The committee there held extensive hearings upon the bill, and I may say that I am heartily in favor of its purpose; but the bill was there referred to a subcommittee of which I was a member, and that subcommittee then came to certain conclusions; and I think I ought to state them, because I think this bill, with the amendments, has the same vice that the House bill had.

The legal title to the lands in question is in this Mission Band of Indians. The bill undertakes to grant a right of way over these lands to the city of San Diego, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to determine the compensation which shall be paid by the city of San Diego for this right of way. It then provides that the proceeds paid in by the city of San Diego shall be used by the Secretary of the Interior to purchase other lands and provide homes for these Indians. Nowhere in the bill is the assent or consent of this tribe of Indians required; and while we may have power to take their lands without judicial hearing or otherwise, unless we either provide for a judicial hearing or provide that the city of San Diego shall give a bond to save the Government harmless from any future claims that may arise, there is nothing to prevent a very large claim arising against the Government in the future by reason of this act.

I had understood that a bill had been agreed upon between the city attorney of San Diego and the Public Lands Committee of the House that covered all these questions and was entirely satisfactory to the city of San Diego. I wish to ask the Senator from California whether he has had any information upon that subject?

Mr. PHELAN. No, Mr. President; I have had no information as to any compromise. If this bill is passed, I suppose it will go to a conference.

Mr. LENROOT. I feel very clear that this bill ought not to pass in this form; and there is another objection to it. There is nothing in the bill that gives to the city of San Diego exclusive occupancy of these lands after the grant is made. The occupancy of the city of San Diego should be exclusive. No Indians at all should be permitted to reside upon the lands that are covered by the grant, because of the necessity of having the purest water possible in this reservoir, and it should be prevented from contamination. There is nothing in the bill that safeguards it in that respect.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LENROOT. I was merely going to say, in conclusion, that if the Senator thinks it would expedite final action upon the bill I shall be willing to let it go through and go to conference; but I feel very clear that it ought not to become a law in its present form.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator very generously says that he will not object, so that the bill may go to the House and ultimately to conference; but as his concern is with respect to the Indian rights I will read for his information this extract from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior to the Hon. SCOTT FERRIS:

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs during a recent trip through the Southwest visited the city of San Diego and the Capitan Grande Indians for the purpose of going into this matter personally. He finds that the city officials are willing and anxious to make full compensation to the Indians for any loss or injury to their property resulting from the construction of the proposed dam; that the property interests of the Indians can be fully protected by the purchase of land for them elsewhere, possibly to their future advantage; that the sentiment among the Indians, as expressed in open meeting, in favor of a more desirable location elsewhere is practically unanimous; and that enlarged water facilities are absolutely essential to the future expansion and development of the city of San Diego.

So the reports rather lead to the conclusion that the Indians have been consulted and that they are agreeable to the change.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a suggestion at that point? The suggestion was made that the consent of the Indians was legally obtained; but there were certain statements made to the committee that make it seem possible that the legal consent of all the Indians could not be obtained; and the Government can not be protected unless it has either the legal consent of the Indians, a judicial proceeding, or a bond from the city of San Diego.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the committee amendments, which will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 1, page 1, line 3, before the word "reservoir," to insert "dam and"; on page 2, line 4, before the words "of the southeast quarter," to strike out "east half" and insert "northeast quarter"; on page 3, line 1, after the word "Interior," to insert "and the Secretary of Agriculture"; and in line 6, after the word "Reservation," to insert "Provided, That the rights herein granted shall not be sold, assigned, or transferred to any private person, corporation, or association, and in case of any attempt to so sell, assign, transfer, or convey, this grant shall revert to the Government of the United States," so as to make the section read:

That rights of way for a dam and reservoir on and over the south half of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter and the north half of the southwest quarter of section 8, the west half of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter and the west half of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 9, all in township 15 south, range 2 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, within the Cleveland National Forest; and on and over the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 15; the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 21; the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter, the northwest quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 22; the west half of the northwest quarter of section 27; the east half of the northeast quarter, the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of section 28; and the northeast quarter, the west half of the southeast quarter, the east half of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 33, all in township 14 south, range 2 east, San Bernardino base and meridian; also the north half of the southwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 3, and lots 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and the south half of section 4, all in township 15 south, range 2 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, within the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation, and all within the county of San Diego and State of California, are hereby granted to the city of San Diego, a municipal corporation in said county and State, whenever said city shall have filed, as hereinafter provided, and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way for the purpose hereinabove set forth, and shall have provided compensation, as hereinafter specified, for damages done to Mission Indians located upon the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation: Provided, That the rights herein granted shall not be sold, assigned, or transferred to any private person, corporation, or association, and in case of any attempt to so sell, assign, transfer, or convey, this grant shall revert to the Government of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 20, after the word "filed," to insert "and approved;" in line 21, after the word "provided," to strike out "and approved by the Secretary of the Interior;" on page 4, line 3, after the word "approval," to strike out "of the Secretary of the Interior," and in line 9, after the word "herein," to strike out "by the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That within one year after the passage of this act the city of San Diego shall file with the register of the United States land office in the district where the lands traversed by said rights of way are located a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way for the purpose stated in section 1 of this act; but no construction work shall be commenced on said land or any portion of the same flooded by water until said map or maps have been filed and approved as herein provided: Provided, however, That any changes of location of said rights of way may be made by the said city of San Diego within two years after the filing of said map or maps by filing such additional map or maps as may be necessary to show such changes of location, said additional map or maps to be filed in the same manner as the original map or maps; and the approval of said map or maps showing changes of location of said rights of way shall operate as an abandonment by the city of San Diego to the extent of such change or changes of the rights of way indicated on the original maps: And provided further, That any rights inuring to the city of San Diego under this act shall, on the approval of the map or maps referred to herein relate back to the date of the filing of said map or maps with the register of the United States land office, as provided herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 14, after the word "all," to insert "appropriations of water heretofore made and to," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the rights of way hereby granted are and shall be subject to all appropriations of water heretofore made and to legal rights heretofore acquired by any person, persons, or corporation in or to the above-described premises, or any part thereof, and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States, and no private right, title, interest, or claim of any person, persons, or corporation in or to any of the lands traversed by or embraced in said rights of way shall be interfered with or abridged, except with the consent of the owner or owners or claimant or claimants thereof, or by due process of law, and just compensation paid to such owner or claimant: Provided, That the rights and claims of the Mission Indians of the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation, located upon the rights of way herein described and affected by the easement herein granted, shall be protected and provided for as hereinafter set forth in section 5 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 5, line 10, after the word "construct" to insert "its dam"; in line 11, after the word "the," to strike out "forest supervisor of the Department of Agriculture" and insert "United States"; in line 12, after the word "value," to insert "as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture"; in line 23, after the word "clear," to insert "and keep clear"; on page 6, line 5, after the words "used by," to strike out "forest officers, officers of the Department of Indian Affairs, and the officers of the Interior Department" and insert "officers and employees of the United States"; in line 8, after the words "allow to," to strike out "the Forest Service" and insert "officers and employees"; in line 9, after the words "United States," to strike out "Department of Agriculture, to the officers of the Department of Indian Affairs, and to the officers of the Interior Department"; in line 16, after the word "telephone," to strike out "wines" and insert "wires"; and, in the same line, after the words "use of," to strike out "said Forest Service, Indian Service, or of the Interior Department" and insert "the United States Government," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the city of San Diego shall conform to all regulations adopted and prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture governing the forest reserves, and shall not take, cut, or destroy any timber within the forest reserves except such as may be actually necessary to remove in order to construct its dam and clear its reservoir, and it shall pay to the United States the full value, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, of all timber and wood cut, used, or destroyed on any of the rights of way and lands within the Cleveland National Forest hereby granted: Provided further, That the city shall construct and maintain in good repair at the flood line of its reservoir a lawful fence, as defined by the laws of the State of California, and subject to such further requirements as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall provide practical gates in such fence at points to be designated by the supervisor of the Cleveland National Forest: Provided further, That the city of San Diego shall clear and keep clear its right of way within the Cleveland National Forest and Capitan Grande Indian Reservation of any débris or inflammable material, as directed by the forester of the United States Department of Agriculture: Provided further, That the said city shall allow any wagon road which it may construct within the Cleveland National Forest or Capitan Grande Indian Reservation to be freely used by officers and employees of the United States and by the public, and shall allow to officers and employees of the United States, for official business only, the free use of any telephones or telegraphs it may construct and maintain within said Cleveland National Forest or on the public lands, together with the right to connect with any such telephone lines private telephone wires for the exclusive use of the United States Government: And provided further, That the Forest Service may, within the Cleveland National Forest or the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation, protect, use, and administer said lands and resources within said rights of way under forest-reserve laws and regulations, but in so doing must not interfere with the full enjoyment of the rights of way by the city of San Diego.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 7, line 6, after the word "Interior," to strike out "but not to exceed $100,000"; and, in line 10, after the word "granted," to insert: "and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to expend the proceeds, or any part thereof, derived from the granting of these rights of way, in the purchase of additional land for the Capitan Grande Band of Indians, the erection of suitable homes for the Indians on the lands so purchased, the erection of such schools, churches, and administrative buildings, the sinking of such wells, and the construction of such roads and ditches, and for such other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Interior to properly establish these Indians permanently on the lands purchased for them," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That, as a condition precedent to the rights of way hereby granted becoming effective, the city of San Diego shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, or to such officer of the United States as may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, a sum of money, to be hereafter determined by the Secretary of the Interior, to compensate the Mission Indians located on the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation, and affected by this grant, for damage sustained by them by reason of the rights of way herein granted; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to expend the proceeds, or any part thereof, derived from the granting of these rights of way in the purchase of additional land for the Capitan Grande Band of Indians, the erection of suitable homes for the Indians on the lands so purchased, the erection of such schools, churches, and administrative buildings, the sinking of such wells, and the construction of such roads and ditches, and for such other expenses as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Interior to properly establish these Indians permanently on the lands purchased for them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 7, line 23, after the words "Provided, however," to strike out:

That if the construction of said reservoir shall not have been begun in good faith within five years from the date of the approval of this act, or if within five years from the date of the approval of this act the city of San Diego shall not have acquired or have commenced proceedings for the purpose of acquiring private lands upon which to construct a dam or dams to be used in connection with the reservoir rights herein granted, or if after such period of five years there shall be a cessation of such construction, or a cessation of proceedings, for a period of three consecutive years, then all rights hereunder shall be forfeited to the United States.

And insert:

That the construction of the aforesaid reservoir shall be prosecuted diligently, and no cessation of such construction shall continue for a period of three consecutive years, and in the event that the Secretary of the Interior shall find and determine that there has not been diligent prosecution of the work, or that there has been a cessation of such construction for a period of three consecutive years, then he may declare forfeited all rights of the grantee herein, and request the Attorney General, on behalf of the United States, to commence suit in the United States District Court for the Southern Disrict of California for the purpose of procuring a judgment declaring all rights to be forfeited to the United States, and upon such request it shall be the duty of the said Attorney General to cause to be commenced and prosecuted to a final judgment such suit: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make no such finding and take no such action if he shall find that the construction or progress of the reservoir has been delayed or prevented by the act of God or the public enemy, or by legal engineering, or other difficulties that could not have been reasonably foreseen and overcome, or by other special or peculiar difficulties beyond the control of the said grantee: Provided further, That in the exercise of the rights granted by this act the grantee shall at all times comply with the regulations herein authorized, and in the event of any material departure therefrom the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, respectively, may take such action as may be necessary in the courts or otherwise to enforce such regulations: Provided further, That if such dam be built the Indians of the Capitan Grande Reservation shall be permitted to reside on, occupy, and cultivate the lands of their present reservation up until within 90 days of the time when water for storage purposes will be turned into the reservoir to be constructed hereunder, provided such occupancy by the Indians will not materially hinder the construction of the dam and storage works, which fact is to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That all lands over which the rights of way mentioned in this act shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such easements: Provided, however, That the construction of the aforesaid reservoir shall be prosecuted diligently, and no cessation of such construction shall continue for a period of three consecutive years, and in the event that the Secretary of the Interior shall find and determine that there has not been diligent prosecution of the work, or that there has been a cessation of such construction for a period of three consecutive years, then he may declare forfeited all rights of the grantee herein, and request the Attorney General, on behalf of the United States, to commence suit in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California for the purpose of procuring a judgment declaring all rights to be forfeited to the United States, and upon such request it shall be the duty of the said Attorney General to cause to be commenced and prosecuted to a final judgment said suit: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make no such finding and take no such action if he shall find that the construction or progress of the reservoir has been delayed or prevented by the act of God or the public enemy, or by legal engineering, or other difficulties that could not have been reasonably foreseen and overcome, or by other special or peculiar difficulties beyond the control of the said grantee: Provided further, That in the exercise of the rights granted by this act the grantee shall at all times comply with the regulations herein authorized, and in the event of any material departure therefrom the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture, respectively, may take such action as may be necessay in the courts or otherwise to enforce such regulations: Provided further, That if such dam be built the Indians of the Capitan Grande Reservation shall be permitted to reside on, occupy, and cultivate the lands of their present reservation up until within 90 days of the time when water for storage purposes will be turned into the reservoir to be constructed hereunder, provided such occupancy by the Indians will not materially hinder the construction of the dam and storage works, which fact is to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 10, line 8, before the word "domestic," to insert "the conservation and storage of water for," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That said reservoir, when constructed, shall be maintained and controlled by the municipal authorities of said the city of San Diego for the use and benefit of said the city of San Diego and the inhabitants thereof and of such other municipalities within the county of San Diego and State of California as may be now or hereafter furnished with water by said the city of San Diego, and for the use and benefit of riparian owners along the San Diego River below the lands herein described, and for the benefit of persons, corporations, or municipalities situated along or adjacent to the pipe line of said the city of San Diego for the conservation and storage of water for domestic, irrigation, or municipal uses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 9, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 8. That the city of San Diego shall sell to the United States for the use of the War and Navy Departments such water as the War and Navy Departments, or either of them, may elect to take, and shall deliver the same through its system in or near the city of San Diego to the mains or systems of such military or naval reservations in that vicinity as may be designated by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, or both, under such rules and regulations as they or either of them may prescribe.

In payment of such water and the delivery thereof, the United States shall pay to said city of San Diego a rental, to be calculated at a fixed rate per 1,000 gallons, said rate not to exceed the actual cost of such water to said city for all water so furnished as determined by meter measurement: And provided further, That payment of said rental shall be made by the local disbursing officer of the War or the Navy Departments in the usual manner: Provided, however, That the grantee shall at all times comply with and observe on its part all of the conditions specified in this act, and in the event that the same are not reasonably complied with and carried out by the grantee upon written request by the Secretary of the Interior, it is made the duty of the Attorney General, in the name of the United States, to commence all necessary suits or proceedings in the proper court having jurisdiction thereof for the purpose of enforcing and carrying out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 12, to change the number of the section from 8 to 9, and, in the same line, after the numeral "9," to insert:

That this act is a grant upon certain express conditions specifically set forth herein, and nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect, or in any way to interfere with the laws of the State of California relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or for municipal or other uses or any vested rights acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this act shall proceed in conformity with the laws of said State.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That this act is a grant upon certain express conditions specifically set forth herein, and nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect, or in any way to interfere with the laws of the State of California relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or for municipal, or other uses or any vested rights acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this act shall proceed in conformity with the laws of said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 21, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That the grantee shall file with the Secretary of the Interior within six months after the approval of this act its acceptance of the terms and conditions of this grant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 1, to change the number of the section from 9 to 11.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to grant rights of way over Government lands for dam and reservoir purposes, for the conservation and storage of water to be used by the city of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes."

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The next business on the calendar was the joint resolution (S. J. Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the absence temporarily on official business of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the substitute reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining may be read, and that the report of the Committee on Mines and Mining accompanying the bill be also read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, and to the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to provide for an adequate and increased supply, to facilitate the production, and to provide for an equitable and better distribution of the following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds thereof, to wit: Antimony, arsenic, ball clay, bismuth, bromine, cerium, chalk, chromium, cobalt, corundum, emery, fluorspar, ferrosilicon, fullers' earth, graphite, grinding pebbles, iridium, kaolin, magnesite, manganese, mercury, mica, molybdenum, osmium, sodium, platinum, palladium, paper clay, phosphorus, potassium, pyrites, radium, sulphur, thorium, tin, titanium, tungsten, uranium, vanadium, zirconium, and of such other rare or unusual elements as the President may, from time to time, determine to be necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and as to which there is at the time of such determination a present or prospective inadequacy of supply; to accomplish which purposes this act is passed. The aforesaid substances mentioned in any such determination are hereinafter referred to as necessaries.

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized from time to time to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the production or purchase of necessaries, to provide storage facilities for and store the same, to provide or improve transportation facilities, and to use, distribute, or allocate said necessaries, or to sell the same at reasonable prices: Provided, That no such contract of purchase shall cover a period longer than two years after the termination of the war.

The President is further authorized, upon finding that importation into the United States of any of the necessaries covered by this act is likely to result in a loss to the United States on any necessaries which it may have acquired hereunder, to ascertain, fix, and proclaim such rate of duty upon such imported necessaries as shall be sufficient to adequately protect the United States from any such loss.

The funds provided by section 6 hereof shall be used in carrying out the powers granted by this section, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal of such necessaries, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the object of this act has been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to requisition and take over any of said necessaries, to provide storage facilities for and to store the same, and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same; and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped, insufficiently developed or operated, or idle land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, producing or, in his judgment, capable of producing said necessaries, and to develop and operate the same, either through the agencies hereinafter mentioned, or under lease or royalty agreement, or in any other manner, and to store, use, distribute, allocate, or sell the products thereof. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, so acquired, is no longer essential for the objects aforesaid, the same shall be returned to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto. The United States shall make just compensation, determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, or operation by the Government of any such necessaries, or any such land, deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person, firm, or corporation entitled thereto, such person, firm, or corporation shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145, of the Judicial Code.

The President is authorized to require statements and reports, to examine books and papers, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem appropriate for carrying out the purposes of this act, including the operation of any such land, deposit, mine, smelter or plant, or part thereof, the purchase, use, sale, or other disposition of articles or substances used, manufactured, produced, or mined therein, and the employment, control, and compensation of employees. The fund provided by section 6 hereof may be used in carrying out the purposes of this act, and all moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the use, operation, or disposal of any such necessaries, land, deposit, mine, smelter or plant, or part thereof, shall be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this act. Any balance of such moneys remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished, shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 4. That any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with any order or requisition made by the President pursuant to the provisions of this act, or who shall obstruct or attempt to obstruct the enforcement of or the compliance with any such requisition or order, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or any rule or regulation adopted hereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1919, for the payment of all administrative expenses under this act, including personal services, traveling and subsistence expenses, the payment of rent, the purchase of equipment, supplies, postage, printing, publications, and such other articles, both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential.

SEC. 6. That the sum of $50,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with all moneys received from time to time under the provisions of this act, all of which shall be credited to said appropriation, shall be used as a revolving fund for carrying out the objects of this act, and for the purpose of making all payments and disbursements, including just compensation under section 3, by this act authorized: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purposes described in the last preceding section: Provided further, That a detailed report of all operations under this act, including all receipts and disbursements, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 25th day of each month, covering the preceding month's operation. Any balance of said revolving fund remaining when the objects of this act have been accomplished shall, as collected, received, and on hand and available, be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 7. That the President is authorized to exercise each, every, or any power and authority hereby vested in him, and to expend the moneys herein appropriated or provided for, or any part or parts thereof, by and through such officer or officers, department or departments, board or boards, agent, agents or agencies as he shall create or designate, from time to time, for the purpose. He may fix the reasonable compensation for the performance of such services, but no official or employee of the United States shall receive any additional compensation for such services except as now permitted by law.

SEC. 8. That the President is authorized, if in his judgment such action be necessary or useful for the objects of this act, to form one or more corporations under the laws of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, for the purpose of carrying out the powers or any of the powers hereby authorized. The capital stock of any such corporation shall be such as the President may determine, but the total capital stock for all corporations so formed shall not exceed in the aggregate the appropriation of $50,000,000, made by section 6 hereof. Said appropriation, or any part thereof, may be used by the President in subscribing on behalf of the United States, through such person or persons as he may designate, to the capital stock of such corporation or corporations, and the capital and assets of any such corporation or corporations, together with all additions thereto under sections 2 and 3 hereof, may be used in carrying out the objects of this act. The directorate and organization of such corporation or corporations shall be such as the President may prescribe, and such corporation or corporations shall have all such charter powers as may be deemed necessary or desirable by the President to enable it or them to accomplish the objects of this act. The capital stock of any such corporation or corporations shall be held and voted for the exclusive benefit of the United States, through such person or persons as the President may designate.

SEC. 9. That the powers and authority granted by this act shall cease upon the expiration of two years after the termination of the present war, and within said period the President, through any officer, department, board, agent, agency, or corporation appointed or created to carry out the provisions of this act, shall dispose of any necessaries, land, deposit, mine, smelter or plant, or part thereof, held by him or it hereunder, and shall fulfill the terms of any contract made hereunder, and thereupon any such corporation or corporations shall be dissolved: Provided, That the termination of this act shall not prevent the subsequent collection of any moneys due the United States, nor shall it affect any act done or any right or obligation accrued or accruing, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced before such termination, but all such collections, rights, obligations, suits and proceedings shall continue as if this act had not terminated, and any offense committed or liability incurred prior thereto shall be prosecuted in the same manner and with the same punishment and effect as if this act had not terminated.

SEC. 10. That if any section or provision of this act shall be declared invalid for any reason whatsoever, such invalidity shall not be construed to affect the validity of any other section or provision hereof.

The report to accompany House bill 11259 is as follows:

The Committee on Mines and Mining after consideration of the bill H. R. 11259 unanimously direct the chairman to report the same favorably, as amended.

Extensive hearings were held by the House Committee on Mines and Mining, and a most comprehensive report submitted by its chairman, both of which were carefully weighed by your committee.

As is so often the case, however, the passage of the bill in the House brought it to the attention of many who had theretofore shown no appreciable interest, and resulted in a flood of suggestions, additional information, and protests, directed to the bill as it came from the House.

The Senate committee, therefore, deemed it advisable to hold further hearings and allow those interested to express their views, and also investigate the further suggestions and new information which the publicity surrounding the passage of the bill had caused to be placed before its members.

These hearings developed many new facts, and in view of these several changes were adopted, which necessitated the practical rewriting of the bill.

The minimum-price principle had the approval of the House, but the attention of your committee was called to the possibility of the Government thereby incurring onerous obligations which might be avoided by an elaboration of the contract principle approved by the House, thus lessening the Government's liability. By the contract system the Government would know definitely just what the obligation would be, whereas the minimum-price feature might so stimulate production as to place it in a most embarrassing position.

The adoption of the contract system places the Government in the position of buyer and seller, necessitating an increase in the appropriation from $10,000,000 to $50,000,000. This, however, is a revolving fund, and should be returned to the Treasury through the various transactions when the purpose of the bill shall be fulfilled.

In the course of the hearings considerable opposition was expressed to the licensing feature, and it does not appear that this is essential to the successful operation of the legislation, and its withdrawal will render the measure more acceptable to the mining industry.

Many penalty provisions were contained in the House bill, but it is felt that this is sufficiently taken care of in section 4 of the amended bill under the President's power to establish rules and regulations, and providing a penalty for failure to comply therewith.

The importance of legislation dealing with the necessities named in the House bill is fully recognized by the Senate committee, and none of these are disturbed. "Sodium," however, was inserted in lieu of "sea salt," which would be included by the former. This is a more comprehensive term, and was recommended by members of governmental agencies interested in the supply of chemicals for the requirements of the United States. The Senate committee also added "phosphorus," on account of the increased demand due to its utilization in various phases of war preparation, such as the smoke screen, steel manufacture, etc.

The importance of legislation affecting the subject matter of this bill is set forth in the report of the House committee (Rept. No. 493). Emphasis is added by a letter of Secretary of the Interior Lane, and by Chairman Baruch, of the War Industries Board, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 2, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your request for an opinion upon H. R. 11259, as amended by the Senate committee, I desire to express my approval of the measure.

Everyone who has followed the shipping situation is aware of the difficulties which have hindered or prevented the importation of many mineral commodities which were not produced in sufficient quantity in this country before the war. The bill is designed to relieve this condition by enabling the Government to more aggressively develop our domestic resources and thereby become less dependent upon foreign sources of supply. In brief, it will permit the Shipping Board to place more vessels at the disposal of the Government for its military program.

I believe that this result alone is ample justification for the bill, but it will also serve to accomplish other ends which are of equal importance. It will insure the Nation against any interruption of war work because of inadequate supplies of the specified mineral products. It will allow the Government to more effectively direct the distribution and use of the different minerals and metals for the purpose of discriminating between essential and nonessential industries. The Government may enforce economies in the preparation and use of the different commodities, and lastly, mining men may be given the assurance and promise of support from the Government to which they are entitled before they should be expected to undertake new mining enterprises which are of vital importance to the country.

I am convinced that the passage of this bill will contribute in a most material way to hasten our war plans and at the same time stabilize and assist the mining industry which to-day faces many grave problems not common to other industries.

May I add that the need of this legislation is immediate. It is a war measure which will place the Government in a position to command a large part of the mineral resources of the country. I recommend the bill to the favorable attention of Congress.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
United States Senate.

WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD,
Washington, September 3, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I trust that the mineral bill will pass with as little delay as possible, as it is becoming more apparent to me daily the necessity of just such powers as outlined therein. The passage of this bill would supply a long-needed want.

Very truly, yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

Your committee recommends that all after the enacting clause of H. R. 11259 be stricken out and to substitute in lieu thereof the following:

Then follows the substitute proposed by the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, undoubtedly the same question presents itself to the minds of some Senators that presented itself to the members of the committee, and that is the necessity for such legislation. At the time the bill came over from the House we went into the matter quite fully regarding the situation of the rare metals and minerals needed in the prosecution of the war, such as manganese, tungsten, chrome, and other metals mentioned in the bill. I am free to admit that at first I questioned whether there was a real necessity for such legislation. Having finally determined that there was a necessity, the question was the form such legislation should take.

We are all familiar with the shipping situation in this country. We know that shortly after we had entered the war the Government took over the control of all the ships and shipping, thereby preventing some of the large industries of the country from importing the rare minerals and metals that were needed in the conduct of their business.

I can do no better than refer to one of the minerals mentioned in the bill—manganese. The production of manganese in the United States for 1917 approximated 115,000 tons. We imported from Brazil 541,000 tons; we imported from India 60,000 tons, approximately; we imported from Cuba about 43,000 tons and from other sources 11,500 tons. That shows that the production in the United States amounted to only 115,000 tons, and there were used during that year approximately 800,000 tons of manganese. Ninety-five per cent of the manganese is used in the steel industry. This would indicate the need of some encouragement in production in this country.

So that Senators may know of these metals, I call attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 23, 1918, on page 5927 and following pages, where there appears a summary of all the metals and minerals mentioned and described in this bill, not only showing their uses but also the production for the prewar period.

The reason why the committee felt that such legislation should be enacted at this time was not only because of the war conditions but of need to meet the after-war conditions. We are all familiar with the old adage, "In time of peace prepare for war." The converse of that rule is equally true, "In time of war prepare for peace."

One of the great questions that will come up, Mr. President, will be the raw materials that the nations have on hand when peace is finally declared. This bill will, in addition to relieving the shipping situation by producing these metals in this country, encourage such production by proper stimulation. It will put the United States in a position of controlling largely these rare metals and minerals, which will be used after the war as well as during the war.

As to the reasons for the changes that the committee felt were necessary in the bill as it came from the House, which changes are incorporated in the bill that has been substituted for the House bill and reported by the Senate committee, I desire to say that the same metals and ores are referred to specifically in the Senate substitute with the exception of sodium and phosphorus. The committee felt that those two should be inserted in the Senate bill and the report explains the reasons for including them. After enumerating the metals and minerals, this language is used:

And of such other rare or unusual elements as the President may, from time to time, determine to be necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and as to which there is at the time of such determination a present or prospective inadequacy of supply.

The reason for inserting those words was in case later it should develop that we had left out some one or more of the rare metals or ores they could be covered by the bill. The question has arisen as to whether or not gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc would come under this proposed act. I am free to say that it was not the intent of the committee to include those metals. In my opinion, gold and silver are precious metals, and copper and lead and zinc could not be classified as "rare or unusual elements" of which there is an "inadequacy of supply." They are base metals. So the language used in the first section of the proposed act was simply to include any other of the rare or unusual metals that we might have overlooked or of which it might be necessary to have control of later.

The House bill also provided for licensing the industry. The committee felt that the licensing feature was unnecessary. If Senators will notice, they will see that the House bill was framed largely on the Lever Act, under which the Food Administration was created, and, in our opinion, there was quite a difference between the agricultural interests and the mining interests of the United States. Therefore, we felt that it was entirely unnecessary to include the licensing feature of the House bill. That was the reason for the elimination of that provision.

We also felt that it was unnecessary to have a minimum price. The contract feature of the Senate bill will take care of that in every instance, so far as we could see and determine. The bill as presented by your committee allows the President—

To enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the production or purchase of necessaries, to provide storage facilities for, and store the same.

Under the contract system practically the same power can be exercised by the Government as would come within the licensing and price-fixing feature of the House bill, and at the same time be fairer to the producer.

We also felt that it was necessary to provide for the formation of a corporation to handle all or any of these rare metals. This power is placed in the hands of the President. In the Senate bill we have made provision for the formation of such corporation or corporations as, in the opinion of the President, may be necessary or desirable. The Senate bill increased the appropriation from $10,000,000 to $50,000,000. It was the opinion of the committee that $10,000,000 was insufficient to meet the needs and requirements of this proposed act. The bill as originally introduced in the House provided for $50,000,000. Fifty million dollars is to be used as a revolving fund, and through the operation of the revolving fund we shall be able to take care of over $150,000,000 of these metals. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that the United States will stand to lose practically any of the $50,000,000; in other words, under this bill the Government becomes the buyer and seller of these rare metals and minerals. It also allocates and distributes them to industries needing and requiring them. Upon such distribution these industries pay the Government for the metals. The money is going out and coming in and, working through the revolving fund, is used over and over again. Therefore there is no reason in the world why the Government should stand to lose any of the $50,000,000 which is proposed to be appropriated by this bill. The only risk taken by the Government is the usual war risk.

The purposes of this proposed act can not successfully be carried out with less than $50,000,000. We went into that matter quite fully and found that it would be useless to attempt such a thing. For example, the value of six months' supply of sulphur required in the manufacture of sulphuric acid for munitions would be from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. The value of six months' stock of high-grade manganese ore would be approximately from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000. The proposed $10,000,000 would have been consumed; it would have been used. With the appropriation of $50,000,000 placed in a revolving fund and used over and over again the Government, I believe, can successfully carry out the purposes of this legislation so as to encourage and stimulate the production of these metals in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On page 20, as I read the italicized print of the bill, at the end of line 23, I desire to ask, What is the necessity for including the word "minerals"? The preceding language reads:

And to provide for an equitable and better distribution of the following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products—

And so forth.

It seems to me that the word "minerals" there is entirely out of order, for it would include every mineral in the world not specifically excluded by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. The words "mineral substances" there include the minerals mentioned on page 21. If the Senator will look at line 12, on page 21, he will find it reads:

The aforesaid substances mentioned in any such determination are hereinafter referred to as necessaries.

So they are referred to in the latter part of the bill as "necessaries," but are confined to those mentioned and named in the bill. The word "mineral" is simply descriptive of the word "substances," showing the kind of substances meant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Even with that interpretation, it seems to me that there is some danger in leaving the word "minerals" in the bill, for it would include all things which are known as minerals. I am afraid that in the interpretation of the bill, if it became a law, it might be held that that word makes the bill include all minerals not specifically excluded from its provisions. If that could possibly be the interpretation, that word ought to go out. I can not see any reason for the word where it stands, anyway, in the light of the provision to which the Senator from Nevada has called attention.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The language seems to me to be perfectly plain. On line 22, page 20, the bill reads:

To provide for an equitable and better distribution of the following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products—

And so on.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator does not read it as it is printed. He has read the words correctly, but he has broken the sense by paying no regard to punctuation, it strikes me. The language is:

And better distribution of the following-named mineral substances and ores.

Then the word "minerals" is put in independently.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It reads, "mineral substances and ores——"

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then there follows, between commas, the word "minerals."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not take it that the word "minerals" is to be segregated from the words "following-named."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It reads:

The following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals—

Suppose we stop at the word "minerals."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not believe that the Senator's construction would obtain. Of course, I see the point which the Senator has in mind, and, if on reflection there should be any doubt about it, the committee will be glad to amend it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish merely to call to the attention of the committee the construction which I have suggested might be placed upon it. I think such an interpretation might be given, the word "minerals" being segregated by commas from the remainder of the sentence.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It was certainly not the intention through the use of the word "minerals" at that particular point to include others than those named.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I merely called attention to the matter for fear of that sort of construction being made. I am not quibbling about the Senator's bill; but it struck me, the word "minerals" being separated from the language preceding and following by commas, as an independent part of the provision, that the use of such a broad generic term would include everything almost that one can think of in a mineral bill at least. That, however, is a mere suggestion which I offer to the Senator, rather than any criticism of the bill. I was afraid of a too broad interpretation being given to the language.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, it has not been the intention of the committee to include in this bill anything outside of what is specifically mentioned and enumerated, except something of the same nature or kind that might have been overlooked; in other words, none of the baser metals were intended to be included in the bill.

I might state, Mr. President, that this measure was under consideration by the committee for over 30 days, and, after hearings, these matters were gone into quite fully and considered by nearly every member of the committee at some time during those hearings. The committee is unanimous in support of the bill and in reporting it to the Senate. Any other metals, such as gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc, it was understood were not to be covered by nor included in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was called from the Chamber and have not had the advantage of hearing all of the statements which have been made by the Senator having this bill in charge. Has the Senator explained the reason for a measure so extraordinary as the one under consideration?

Mr. HENDERSON. In a general way, Mr. President, I have stated it.

Mr. KING. May I state as a premise to the question that I have just suggested and one which I shall propound that recently when in the West I met a number of individuals who have mineral properties and mines of the character described in this bill who evinced no desire to have the Government take over their mineral properties. They were satisfied with the high prices the market afforded them for their metals. A number of the individuals who had large and extensive sulphur deposits were anxious to have the Government, if it needed the sulphur, purchase the same; but they did not want the Government to mine their properties. I can not understand the reason for the Government embarking upon the mining business, and that is one of the purposes of this bill, as I understand. I would like to add, however, that this bill was reported but a day or two ago, and I procured a copy of it only a few minutes since. The testimony taken by the committee has not yet been printed, and Senators not members of the committee reporting the bill are at a disadvantage and are not advised as to the facts calling for this bill, or the full scope and purpose of the same. If we throw open the mineral lands of the United States to public occupancy and do not hamper by unjust and improper regulations of the Interior Department or other governmental agencies the development of the mineral lands, the ability and the genius of the American people will uncover and exploit the mineral wealth lying hidden in the ground. Is there any necessity for the Government going into the mining business? If it does so, it goes into the business in competition with those who are now engaged in the business. Are there any restrictions in the bill as to wages which the Government shall pay to the men whom it employs? If not, the Government may take over the sulphur mines, the fluorspar mines, and other mining properties referred to in this bill without limitation and upon the wages which it pays, and, of course, by the extravagant methods which the Government always adopts it would drive every private enterprise out of the business. Of course, the result would be the augmentation of the price of metals.

The observations which I have made are rather generalizations instead of questions, but the Senator has seen the drift of my mind; and, if he cares to do so, it would afford me very great pleasure to have him make such explanations as he may wish respecting those matters.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Utah, I will state that it is not the intention of the committee to put the Government in the mining business; nor is it the intention of this bill that the Government shall operate and work mines, generally speaking.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator consent to an amendment that the Government shall not engage in the mining business and that nothing in this bill shall be construed as authorizing the Government of the United States to take over the mines and mining properties herein described and go into the mining business?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, Mr. President. But the Senator did not let me finish my statement. This bill simply provides that the Government may take over any idle deposit or mine, and any smelter or plant which operates on the specific metals mentioned and described in this bill, and also provides for a leasing system and a royalty agreement. I have talked with different officials and the heads of some of the departments, relative to that very provision, and I can assure the Senator that it is not the intention of the Government, unless it becomes absolutely necessary, to operate any of these properties; but if the Government were compelled, through force of circumstances, to take over any idle mine to get the metal that might be mentioned in the bill, it could lease it, so that a private person or a corporation could operate it under lease or under royalty agreement. I repeat, therefore, that it is not the intention for the Government to go into the operating business itself unless it becomes absolutely necessary for the Government to do so; but I would not feel justified in tying the hands of the Government, because it might be necessary for the Government to take such action before we get through with this war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a further question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Inviting attention to section 3, to which the Senator has just referred, I find that the language is very much broader in scope than the interpretation which the Senator places upon the section. It reads:

That the President is authorized to requisition and take over any of said necessaries—

By that, of course, it means any of the mining properties referred to in section 1 of the bill, and particularly mining properties containing the metals and minerals referred to on pages 20 and 21 of the bill now under consideration. The section further authorizes the President "to provide storage facilities for and to store the same, and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same; and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped, insufficiently developed or operated, or idle land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof."

Who is to determine whether a mining property is undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated? The mine owner, knowing the situation of the property, and the obstacles which he has to encounter in the prosecution of the work, may aver—and his knowledge would be much superior to that of some clerk sent out from the Bureau of Mines or from the Interior Department in Washington, or one of the clerks of the agency created by this bill—that it is being properly and economically developed, while one of the clerks or agents sent out by the agency or bureau that will have charge of this matter may go to a mining property and say, "I do not think you are developing this in the right way; it is underdeveloped; it is not properly developed," and seize the mine and take it away from the owner.

The bill goes further than the Senator has suggested; it permits the Government to take charge of any mine described in the bill and to operate it, to pay any wages that it pleases, to employ any instrumentality that it desires, and to go into competition thereby with people who are engaged in mining activities. It seems to me that it is a very dangerous thing; it seems to me with my limited knowledge of the subject that it is absolutely unnecessary. The high price of metals will command their development; all that people need for the purpose of developing the minerals is a market, and, of course, man power, and the Government would have the same difficulty in getting man power as individuals would have. I can not comprehend the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator from Utah will bear in mind how this bill came to the Senate he will realize the difficulties we have had in framing this measure. When the bill came over from the House I was afraid that its operation was going in some way to interfere with the working of mining claims in the West. I found that in the House they had adopted the provisions of the Lever bill as to agriculture and applied it to mines. That seemed to me wrong, and I felt very great disappointment at the form in which the bill had been sent to the Senate.

In that bill as originally introduced there was provided a maximum and minimum price, which, I think, is a very bad policy, especially as applied to minerals, for in the case of a maximum price, unless the maximum is placed very high it is usually destructive of the very industry itself. However, after discussion of the matter for a long time, the members of the committee concluded that they would eliminate the maximum-price feature but that they would leave in the minimum-price provision. Then the difficulty arose as to what condition the Government would be in if the bill provided for the fixing of a minimum price—a guaranteed price—as to metals, the quantity of which it was difficult to ascertain and determine. The Government would have to guarantee the minimum price for a considerable period of time—probably for two or three years—and if a very great stimulation occurred on account of a high minimum price, the result would be that the Government might have on its hands millions and millions—yes, hundreds of millions—of tons of metal for which it would have little use, even during the period of the war. Therefore there might accrue an immense and indeterminable liability upon the part of the Government, but a liability so great that it might almost bankrupt the Government. So the Senate committee began to take testimony. They took testimony every day for fully one month, and gradually the idea pervaded the mind of every member of the committee that it would not do under any circumstances to have a maximum price, and that, considering the liability which the Government might incur, it would be very dangerous, indeed, to fix a minimum price. The result was that we came to the conclusion that the safest and best way for the Government, and also for the miner himself, was to provide for a revolving fund, to be placed in the hands of the President, by which he could contract for just what he wanted. He would probably make his contracts for a larger amount of metal than he really needed, because in a good many instances he would not be able to get the production which a steadily producing mine can be relied upon to yield; but, nevertheless, in order to encourage the mining of these minerals, we felt that the way to do it was to contract for them and buy them, and that is the spirit of this bill. It provides a fund and authorizes the President to buy and then to sell these minerals which are needed in commerce, in the manufacture of explosives, and all kinds of armaments. That was the situation that confronted us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Government may already buy and doubtless is buying whatever is required for governmental purposes. So what is the necessity for this grant of power?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the first place, it is contemplated that the Government will make contracts with the miners in regard to working prospects that are not now paying, for the purpose of aiding in the development of those mines and bringing forth and producing the minerals. The object is to give them a sufficient price to stimulate production.

These minerals have gone up considerably in price, and there is some stimulation by reason of that fact; but the object of this bill is to get these metals in quantity. Because so many of them are found in other parts of the world, the shipping facilities being inadequate to bring them over here, it was deemed by those who heard the testimony that it would be best to stimulate and encourage production by making large contracts, something which probably never would be considered in time of peace, but which, nevertheless, was considered absolutely necessary for the purpose of bringing forth and producing these rare minerals.

That is the object and purpose of the bill. It is not designed for the purpose of going into the manufacturing of anything or for the purpose of mining. It is said that where there is an abandoned mine, which it is thought, if properly developed, might produce large quantities of ore, or where a mine is found that is not being worked effectively on account of lack of capital on the part of the owners of the mine, the Government could make those mines heavy producers, either by making tempting contracts for their ores or by taking over the mines.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a further interruption?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Government now in many lines of industry and activity, particularly war activities, has been compelled to enter into contracts for the purchase of important commodities used in war preparations. It has made contracts, I am advised, for the acquisition of steel and steel products and other commodities which will suggest themselves readily to the mind of the Senator. It has made contracts extending over a considerable period; it has made contracts for the purchase of wool, for the purchase of blankets and shoes, and these contracts extend over a period of several months, and, indeed, I am advised, for one year and possibly more. The Government requires, if I understand the Senator rightly, some of these metals, perhaps all of them. Why may not the Government enter into contracts with the owners of mines and prospects, those who are producing these metals or those who may contemplate producing them, for the purpose of acquiring such as the Government may need in its war activities? If it can make contracts for the purchase of steel and other war necessities, why may it not make contracts now for the purchase of needed metals without any additional legislation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator I will say that those who are familiar with all of the legislation to which the Senator has referred have concluded that the Government can not make the character of contract that is intended to be made under this bill; and, even if it could, there are some features of the contract which it likely would not make under existing law. These are not contracts of that exact nature where you can buy a great quantity of copper by the pound, and know that when you make the contract you will get the exact amount. The object is to make a contract with a man who will go out and find these metals, to encourage the production of a mine that is being operated at a very small output, and so stimulate it, either by increase of price or by loans or in any other manner, as to make it a large producer. It was thought that that power did not exist under the laws that have been passed up to this time. This bill comes from the department, and while at first it seemed to me an objectionable bill, it has turned out, in my judgment, to be one that will stimulate the production of these rare metals.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. KING. I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that many of the metals herein referred to have been produced, probably in limited quantities, some of them in large quantities, in the past; but by reason of the fact that the demands for the products were not very great, there has been more or less of a subsidence of production, and possibly in some instances a complete cessation of production. Take, for instance, sulphur: I remember that a number of years ago, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, there was a considerable production, but the production in other States was so much greater and so much cheaper that the sulphur mines there shut down. Now there is great activity, and they are starting them up again because of the increased price. There is not a single metal referred to in this section but that will be produced if the market demands it and if it is in this country; and you do not need to have the Government projected into the field as a producer in order to stimulate production. If there is a market for the product, men will go and get it out of the ground.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there is this objection to that, which does not follow the course of the Senator: In order to develop mines you often have to have large quantities of money, and the owner may not have the money; then the price of the product may be up for the next six months and then it may fall flat. You have to lay out a development plan for your mine that may mean the expenditure of thousands and thousands of dollars. Men are not going to undertake that expenditure on the basis of a mere temporary increase or variation in the market price. This bill is for the purpose of making it possible for owners of mines to make contracts with the Government on a large scale, even at a higher price than the ruling price might be, so that if the Government needs a particular element, or needs a particular acid, or needs a particular ore, it can get it; and the Government wants to get as much of it from this country as it can.

We are cut off from some sources of supply by reason of the fact that our ships can not go to all parts of the world and by reason of the fact that these ores that are wanted very much can not be obtained from abroad. Now, an element of cost that might be considered by the President in endeavoring to make a contract is the question of the high cost of transportation from the foreign country or the South American country to our shores and the difficulty of getting it here. This bill is supposed to give him complete control of all those conditions. It is a grant of great power. There is no doubt about that. It is subject to abuse. It might be abused; that is true; and it may be that the authorities would contract at higher prices than would develop in the ordinary course. When you consider, however, that we are in war, when you consider that these things are necessary, and necessary to be had quickly, you can readily see that a bill of this kind is much more conservative than the bill that came over from the House, or the bill that was introduced in the Senate, by which maximum and minimum prices are fixed as to all of these metals produced throughout the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. In the observations thus far submitted I have not made any complaint about the extensive powers granted to the President and to the department or agency that will carry the terms of this bill into execution. What I have been complaining of, in a mild way, was the lack of necessity for the enactment of a measure of this character, and what the Senator has said confirms the views which I have announced. He has just stated that because of the lack of shipping facilities we have been unable to get some of these metals from other countries. That being true, if we can not get them from other countries, it is manifest that we must get them at home. That means, then, that private capital, private endeavor, will go into the mountains and into the mines and produce these metals which are absolutely necessary now. The cost of the past will not be a measure of the cost of the present or the profits which will be yielded to the domestic producers.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is right.

Mr. KING. I think the logical conclusion of the Senator's argument is this: We need these metals. We can produce them in our own country. Heretofore we have acquired most of them or some of them from abroad. We can not get them from abroad now because of lack of shipping facilities. It necessarily follows, therefore, from the Senator's position, that they will be produced here by individuals, because the profits will be so great as to be an inducement for them to engage in their production. The condition in this respect is just the same as it is with a multitude of things which the Government to-day is requiring, and hundreds of new enterprises and new plants have been started up by private individuals to meet the growing demands of the Government necessitated by the war. So it will be here.

It does seem to me that the Senator's argument leads to the conclusion that private capital, private ingenuity, and private industry will go out and develop the mining districts as they have developed the mining regions of our country in the past. The Senator knows that the profits, or the hope of profits, upon the part of the miner have led to the development of the great mining industry of our country; and the Government, by reason of the very sensible policy which it has pursued in the past, in contradistinction to the old, obsolete policy pursued by Mexico and by Spain—and by our Government, by the way, in the early days—has encouraged the development of the mining resources of our country. Coal has been produced in great abundance; lead and silver and gold and the precious metals and the other metals and minerals have been produced in great abundance; and, according to the demands of the people, by the wise and liberal policy which our Government has pursued. All that we need to do now is to pursue the same wise policy, and with the high prices that these metals will bring in the market there will be produced whatever the Government requires and whatever private enterprise requires.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I agree with everything the Senator says except this: He seems to think that the prices now are sufficient to stimulate production, whereas we know from the quantity we are receiving and the very little that is being taken out of the rocks that the production has not been stimulated enough to give us the amount we need and the amount which these experts say is necessary to properly prosecute the war. We have been stimulating other things, and the proposition is as to whether or not we should stimulate the production of these rare metals. We have therefore given the President the power to make contracts not only as to mines which produce regularly so much per month but with those that are depleted, that have been successful in days when mining operations were in full blast and afterwards stopped because of some disaster or something happened by reason of which they could not produce.

A bill of this kind, or something of this nature, is deemed by the powers that be absolutely necessary, and in response to that need these three bills have been presented. In my judgment the safest bill, the fairest bill, the bill that will not get the Government into deep water, is the bill we have before us, rather than the House bill, which provides for a maximum price for everything that is produced in the United States in the way of these metals, or a minimum price, under which the Government, by guaranteeing the price of all that might be produced, might be involved in a liability of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I see that this bill proposes to establish in Washington another bureau and appropriates for the purpose the sum of $500,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that sum of money will be needed to establish a bureau in Washington just for the mining interests of this country? Where are we going to put all these people? What are we going to do with them?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, we have things that need attention, and we must have the machinery with which to deal with them.

Mr. OVERMAN. How does the Senator arrive at the sum of $500,000 for administrative purposes?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, that seems to be the amount that it was felt would surely cover it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who estimated it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think it was estimated by the Bureau of Mines; was it not?

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, the situation now relative to some of these matters is most critical. As a matter of fact, I do not feel at liberty to speak of it on the floor of the Senate, and the $500,000 provided in this bill for administrative expenses by some has been deemed too small.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, the whole Mining Bureau of the United States does not cost that much.

Mr. HENDERSON. In this connection, I wish to state that already the head of one of the departments in Washington has sent abroad an employee of his department in order to investigate the conditions relative to some of these metals and paid the expenses of this trip from his own funds. Officially he did not have a 5-cent piece for the purpose. There are metals that we need, which we can get in other countries, but we can not get them here. It is impossible to get them here.

Mr. OVERMAN. This appropriation does not call for that. This is administrative. This is to pay salaries. This is to buy stationery. You propose to give some men $100,000 salary, I expect.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; not at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. This provides for the appropriation of a lump sum.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill provides, as you will find, that out of this fund they could send a man to South America; they could send a man to South Africa; they could send a man to China. For instance, suppose you need some antimony and had to get it right away, you could send wherever necessary to get it. In other words, this bill will put us in a position where, after the war, we will have these raw materials at our fingers' ends; and it is the desire, as I understand it, of the Government to be in a position to control the raw materials.

Mr. OVERMAN. But $500,000 is appropriated here, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of administrative expenses.

Mr. HENDERSON. That would be part of the administrative expenses.

Mr. OVERMAN. To send a man to Europe?

Mr. HENDERSON. It would be part of the administration. You could not take any of it from the $50,000,000. The $50,000,000 provided for in the next chapter is simply for the purchase of the metals referred to in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Referring to what the Senator has suggested about the Government sending somebody abroad for the purpose of getting minerals or metals that are required, and the necessity, perhaps, in the future, of doing so, there is not a department of the Government to-day—that is, the War Department or the Navy Department—that might want those metals but that has the authority, if it needs those metals for war purposes, to buy them, no matter where it needs them; and if it is necessary to send a man abroad to get the metals it can do so. This appropriation is not necessary.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah must be mistaken. The Government has the right to buy metals to be used in its own plants, but it has not the right to buy metals and allocate them to those concerns which are manufacturing commodities for the Government. In other words, the Government has not the right to buy pig iron and allocate it to the steel plants of the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not agree with the broad statement submitted by my distinguished friend, to whose superior judgment I always am glad to yield due deference. It seems to me very clear that if the War Department, for instance, had a contract with the Bethlehem Steel Works for the purpose of producing cannon, and the Bethlehem Steel Works should say, "We need some vanadium, or some other rare metal, and the Government must aid us in securing it," the Government could send abroad for it, or buy it at home, and deliver it, or—using the expression of the Senator—allocate it to those corporations here that are engaged in the production of munitions or ordnance for the Government, deducting it, of course, from the price ultimately to be paid.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will say to the Senator that one of the great objects of this bill is to provide some agency of the Government which can do that very thing; and the reason why we want to provide for it is that no agency of the Government is now authorized to do that. At any rate, the combined judgment and information of all of the members of the Mining Committee was that no existing agency was authorized to perform such functions; and it therefore became necessary and is necessary to create an agency to do the precise thing which the Senator from Utah thinks ought to be done.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think this is a fair illustration of the condition which prevails with respect to these metals: The Government of the United States is spending millions of dollars, hundreds of millions, for blankets and for woolen goods for the soldiers. I have not any doubt, and I do not think the Senator can have any doubt, but that the Government of the United States could go out and purchase wool in the market, deliver it to the corporations which have the contracts for making the blankets and the woolen goods, and charge them the price of the wool, or such price as the Government desired, and it would go in diminution of the final payment which the Government was to make. If the Senator will pardon me further, I am assured by one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], that it has already been done.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think it has not been done. According to my information, it has not been done. Of course, I am not familiar with the woolen industry; but, as I understand the woolen situation, it is simply this: The War Industries Board got the woolgrowers and the wool dealers together, and they came to a mutual agreement as to the price of wool and as to the allocation of wool; but no agency of the United States has gone out to buy the raw wool and allocate it to the various factories of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that he is mistaken. The Government of the United States has commandeered all the wool in the United States. It has designated certain places to which that wool shall be shipped. It has appointed agents to place a value upon the wool, and only yesterday I saw a valuation of 61¼ cents a pound put upon a shipment from my State. The Government pays that price for the wool. The wool is in a warehouse designated by the Government of the United States, in Boston; and there is not a single pound of wool in the United States that can be sold other than to the United States.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as I said, I am not as familiar with the wool situation as I am with some of these other things, but I am still not convinced that the statement of the senior Senator from Utah is correct. My information is that the Government is not putting its dollars into the purchase of that wool; that the War Industries Board had the woolgrowers and the wool dealers come into a conference and by agreement fix the price; and that the War Industries Committee is handling this wool with funds furnished by the manufacturers of the wool. The same question arose with regard to sugar. There was no fund with which to buy sugar, and so the refiners of the country came to a voluntary agreement to put up the money with which to finance the Cuban crop of sugar and allocate it among themselves. It was a voluntary organization. If any fund has been put at the disposal of the Government of the United States with which to go out into the West and buy wool and turn it over to a woolen manufacturer up in Boston, I do not know where the law for it can be found.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course the Senator has a perfect right to doubt my statement; but I can tell the Senator the names of the men who have been appointed by the Government to buy wool in the State of Utah, and they are authorized to collect the wool in certain quantities; and, mind you, the wool is paid for by the Government of the United States.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, I know that the Senator usually has very accurate information, but my information upon this point is diametrically opposed to what he has stated here to be the case in his State. I know that in my State they have formed this organization to handle the output of wool; but if there is a fund created under this Government with which to buy wool and distribute it or allocate it to manufacturers, I do not know it, and I should like to have some statement of it other than the mere recollection of myself or any other Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator doubt that the Government is buying wheat and paying for it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is done with a special fund that is specifically provided for. If the Senator wants to follow the logic of his argument, there was no necessity for the legislation which appropriated $150,000,000 with which to handle the wheat crop. We had to provide legislation for that. We had to make the appropriation of the $150,000,000, and created a fund with which to do just that thing, and gave specific authority for it; but, so far as wool is concerned, or any of these metals, I do not know of any such authority.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know that they are doing it with metals. I have never heard it, and I have made no argument whatever upon it. I have simply stated the conditions existing with regard to wool.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I still think that the Senator upon getting detailed information, will find he is mistaken about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that only yesterday I received a letter from the War Industries Board in answer to a letter of complaint that I had from one of my constituents that his wool had been shipped to Boston, and that it had been valued at 61¼ cents a pound, and that he had been waiting now for some two or three weeks for the Government to send him the money for it, and asking me to see if the money could not be sent at a very early date, because of the fact that he was in dire necessity for it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator if he has ascertained what official of the United States is authorized to pay for that wool?

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the same official that had power to commandeer the wool, and that is the War Department.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What official commandeered the wool, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it was the War Industries Board. I do not think there is a member of the Military Affairs Committee but that will immediately say that the wool of the United States has been commandeered.

Mr. KIRBY. That is our information. That is the information we have received directly from the people in charge of it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The wool of this country, as I understand, has been put at the disposal of the War Industries Board by voluntary agreement. They agreed upon the price, and the whole matter is being handled by voluntary agreement and not under any direct authorization of law for commandeering it or purchasing it and allocating it to the industries of the country.

Mr. President, with regard to this bill, it seems to me that the situation is not adequately understood. The metals mentioned in this bill are rare metals. The quantity of these metals required during the war has very greatly increased. If you take practically any metal mentioned in the bill, the uses of that metal have multiplied many, many fold.

Take manganese, which has been referred to here. The quantity of manganese required has increased several fold. Take other metals which were used before the war in small quantities and are now required in very great quantities. So the thing to be accomplished is to get for this country more of these rare metals.

The question of transportation has been referred to as an important item, and it is, indeed, an important item; but some of these metals were obtained before the war principally in the countries which are now at war against us, and so for those metals it has become essential to the conduct of the war that the supply in the United States should be increased. Now, that is the problem. How shall we increase the supply of these metals in the United States. The time may come as to some of them when we can build ships enough to continue the importation in sufficient quantities, but we need them now, we ought to have them now, and we ought to have the increased production just as soon as it can come. Now, how can we do it?

The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has suggested that the price will supply the demand. The evidence taken before the committee shows that the price of many of these metals has increased up to 1,000 or 2,000 per cent since the war started. It appears in the testimony that the price of nearly every mineral mentioned herc which is produced in the United States has increased 200 or 300 per cent. But that does not bring enough. The reason of it is, and I invite the attention of the Senator from Utah and others who are interested in the subject, the difficulty in producing a supply of ore of one of these rare metals through a mere increase of price without a definite length of time for the price to prevail. In order to open up some of these prospect mines it is necessary to make a large expenditure. Take the supply of manganese, for instance. Manganese is found in many sections of the United States, but it is found in a peculiar formation. Before the war manganese was imported into the United States at such a price that only those producing manganese at the very lowest cost could compete with the importation of manganese, but the price has gone up now very much higher than it was. However, a man who has a manganese deposit, or thinks he has it, will not put a large investment in the development of that ore unless he is insured in some way of a market. He knew the conditions before the war did not justify the development of that property.

Mr. SMOOT. Try a tariff.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. A tariff might cover a little of it; it would protect the individual to whom I refer, who is surrounded with a difficult problem. Any tariff that might be thought of would not satisfy him, because he would come in competition, even with a reasonable tariff, with the low-cost producers of the United States. Senators ought to know that it is very much more expensive to develop one property than it is another. One deposit may be several miles from a railroad, and the cost of transportation under existing conditions may be prohibitive. If you are going to develop that property and make it to his advantage to produce ore, you have got to give him some assurance as to the price which he will receive when he gets his product from the ground.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Government is confronted with the same situation now with respect to lead and copper. In order to enable those who are producing copper for the Government to do so at any sort of a living price it has to fix 26 cents a pound on copper, as a result of which the few mines that produce very cheaply are making stupendous profits. The same situation the Senator alluded to exists in almost every activity because there are no two producers of anything, whether it is shoes or anything that enters into the consumption of life where the cost of production is the same to each individual who is producing it. There is always an advantage, great or small, in favor of one producer as against another.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What the Senator has said is quite true, and it is to obviate the evil which the Senator has suggested that this bill was prepared. I was coming to that situation. In order to control the price of coal a plan was adopted of fixing a minimum blanket price on coal. The result was just that pictured by the Senator from Utah. It gave to the low-cost producers an enormous profit, a profit which they never dreamed of getting, and I must say that a large percentage of the coal mined in the United States to-day is being sold at a profit far beyond that which the producers should get. But in order to encourage the production of coal and get an increased supply it was necessary to fix a price which would enable the high-cost producers to live. Now, that was done with a blanket price. The evils which have resulted from it are many. They are stupendous, as suggested by the Senator from Utah.

The only reason why the Government of the United States should not buy all the coal of the country and sell it to the consumers is because of the stupendousness of the job. The economics in favor of doing that sort of thing are perfectly sound, but when you consider the immense number of customers, every household in the land, when you consider that there are 20,000 concerns mining coal, when you consider the immense quantity of it, you will not find any one individual in the United States who would like to tackle the job of buying it and selling it. If such a provision could be administered in a practical way and without too much of a burden upon the Government in such administration economically it would be sound. We could buy the coal from the men who produce it at a dollar a ton with a reasonable profit, buy it from the men who produce it at $3 a ton, only making a reasonable profit, and put the whole together in one theoretical bin and sell it out to the citizens of the country at a reasonable and average price. That is the ideal thing to do, but when you come to put it into practical operation it is impossible or it is impracticable to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not sit still under the statement just made by the Senator from New Mexico. I agree with him that there is, theoretically, but one way in which to handle the coal situation, and everything that has been said with regard to the injustice of fixing a price even in a limited district is true, but I believe it is entirely practical to pursue the plan set forth in our statutes. When Congress passed the fuel-control bill it gave to the Fuel Administrator the power to fix a price or to buy and sell at a uniform price.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am rather inclined to cast some doubt upon the power of the Fuel Administration to buy all the coal of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from New Mexico will examine the statute he will have no doubt about it at all, because it was the subject of a great deal of consideration in the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] introduced the amendment which was a composite, a part of his authorship and a part of mine, and I presented it, insisting that purchase and sale was the only way in which the matter could be dealt with without allowing some operators to earn enormous profits and other operators to go without any. I am sure the Senator will find that it is in the statute. I wanted that plan. I wanted to see the administration adopt that plan. I think it must adopt that plan if the war is to continue very long. I could not sit by and hear it said that the plan was impractical and could not be adopted without at least raising my voice in protest against the statement. I think it is the only plan.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thank the Senator from Iowa for his observations. It may be, I am willing to assume, that the statement of the Senator is correct as to the present provision of the law, but it has been found impractical for the reasons I have stated to thus handle the coal situation. But when you come to metals it is impossible in a greater degree to encourage their production in the way that the production of coal is sought to be encouraged, because the cost of production of these metals varies to such a great degree more than the production of coal that it is impossible to apply the same method of handling the problem.

Take the wheat crop of the country. The quantity of wheat which can be produced is certain, within reasonable limitations. The cost of the production of wheat is likewise reasonably certain. You may fix a price which will not give too great a profit to one concern or prevent the other from a reasonable prospect of a profit. So with regard to coal. But when you come to fix a blanket price upon these metals you are confronted with a situation about which there is no ascertainable information as to the cost of production or the supply which can be obtained. The mining of ore, and especially of these rarer ores, is highly speculative, and the only way to encourage the production of such a metal as that is to deal with the individual in a way which will induce him to enter into a speculative undertaking.

You can not fix a blanket price for all these rarer metals upon a speculative basis in order to increase their production. We have mines throughout the country producing some of these metals to a greater or less extent. We are producing of these metals a very large percentage, and in order to get a greater production it would be unwise to increase the price which the persons at the present time are obtaining, and the prices which they are obtaining to-day are admittedly high. There is not a metal mentioned here where the producers are complaining of the price, but there are many prospects throughout the country where the owners are hesitating about developing the mines. They have the prospect, but in order to develop it a large investment must be made. They are unwilling to make the investment unless they are assured of a market. They want the market. How are you going to insure the market? So instead of making a blanket price under this bill, the Government agent will go to the prospector and agree with him that if he will produce within the next two years a given number of tons of the specified ore he shall receive a fixed price for it. Thereupon, being assured of a market for a definite quantity of ore, he makes his investment; he develops his property; he produces the ore, and it goes into the plants of the country for war purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In line with what the Senator is saying I want to cite an illustration of what occurred in the State of Colorado with respect to molybdenum, which is a rare metal, and which at one time sold for an enormous price. Knowing that there was some in a certain region of our State, parties concluded that they would open up a mine, and they did so at a very great expense. Then the price of molybdenum went down, and the result is that the mine is not being worked at the present time. You have got to give, as the Senator says, a definite period of time for the operation of the contract, or a contract for a certain number of tons of ore, in order that they will undertake the development of the mine.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator's contention, the Government of the United States needs a large quantity of these rare metals. Conceding that to be true, why may not the Government make a contract for the purchase, even though that contract does extend beyond a few months, and extend it for two years?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is exactly the purpose of this bill.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator deny that the Government has the power now to contract for those things which it requires in the prosecution of the war?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I stated in the beginning that it was just the purpose of this bill to confer the power. The Government has not the power at the present time.

Mr. KING. I beg respectfully to dissent from the position of the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me suggest to the Senator, if the Government has the power now, what harm can there be in relieving the minds of people who think it has not the power?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I happen to know this. In talking with Mr. Baruch about this very situation he said he had been making contracts that there was no authority for in law, and in so doing he was involving his private fortune; but he is willing to do so in order to get the metals and carry on the war. What we are seeking to do now is to confer the authority to give some legal sanction to what the War Industries Board has been doing, jeopardizing the private fortunes of members of that board.

Mr. President, I think if the Senator from Utah understood this bill he would not oppose it. I am not surprised that all Senators do not understand the bill. It is impossible for Senators to understand all the bills that are introduced here. It is only upon discussion that they can be made clear, and that is the purpose of the discussion now. I believe when this bill is understood it will meet with the approval of every Member of the Senate. I do not know of any substantial objection which can be urged to it. There is no objection which could be urged to it if you assume, as I think every Senator must assume, that there is an absolute necessity for increasing the production of these minerals. If you once agree to the premise that the quantity of these minerals must be increased, then I think you will agree that the method proposed by the bill is the best one at least that has been suggested for bringing about the increase. If you assume that it must be increased, then I ask anyone in the Senate Chamber to propose any other method which is better than this. If he will do it I am ready to accept that other method.

The Mines and Mining Committee went into this subject and spent weeks on it. We tried to find out some way whereby it could be done and cause just as little disturbance of business as possible. We wanted to keep this business especially as nearly along peace-time lines as it was possible to do it. We did not want to interfere with any miner or any operator who is handling these ores, but we were confronted with a condition where it was necessary to increase production.

Now, how are you going to do it? We came to the conclusion that instead of having a licensing system and putting all the miners of the country under a license, instead of creating here in Washington a great bureau to supervise the business of every miner in the country, we would give somebody authority to go to the man with a prospect, to go to the man with a mine that needs further development, and say to him: "If you will furnish so many tons of ore to the Government in the next two years, we will give you a definite price for it." If you do that, you will increase production. It does not mean that you shall give the same price to all the men mining the same class of ore. You may let the present price remain where it is as to existing producers, but when you want to encourage a man to develop a new mine, to extend his operations which will require the investment of capital, you agree with him upon the price of his output for a definite length of time.

I will ask any Senator, Is not that the business way of handling this problem? Can you suggest a better? Will not that accomplish the results which we seek if it can be brought about, and will it not be brought about with the very least expense to the Government of the United States?

Mr. President, that is all that is involved in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit an interrogatory?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to express myself as being in hearty sympathy with the purpose of the bill as explained by the Senators who have been on the floor in advocacy of it. But I was wondering, in looking at page 21, whether or not you had not included in the metals a great number that were not necessary to be included. Some of them I notice in reading it over are commonly distributed and some are found in very large quantities. My only suggestion is that probably it would relieve some opposition to the bill on the part of some Members of the Senate if in the bill we included those prime necessities of which the Senator has so well spoken, where we can not import the metals or where they do not exist for importation, where our allies are needing them as badly as we, and where they are produced in a country with which we are at war, and it becomes essential for us by any sort of means within ordinary common sense to provide them for carrying on the war. Does not the Senator think it weakens the bill by including so many metals in it that are not essential? I think it would relieve some opposition to the bill if nothing was permitted that was not absolutely necessary. For instance, take antimony. We might enter into a discussion to see if the production of antimony needs to be developed. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that it would facilitate its passage if nothing was included in its operation except the classification of essential minerals.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The suggestions of the Senator from Arizona are in entire harmony with the thought which came to my mind soon after we started in to taking testimony on the bill. I was of the same mind the Senator seems to have at the present time, and we tried to take out these metals so that we could limit the bill in its operation to a specified few. But the more we tried to do that the more difficult it became. We found that the ramifications of these various industries are such that the very next day after passing the bill it might be necessary to include in it some metal which we had left out, owing to prospective conditions, which do not necessarily exist to-day, but which we could see would in all likelihood exist in the near future. That is why we put them in. I will state, however, that this whole machinery is simply to conserve the power and furnish the means for doing these things when the necessity arises. The necessity is apparent and it is acute with regard to certain of these metals, but not so acute in regard to others. However, I believe that so far as certain conditions are concerned, we might for the immediate present leave out several of these metals, but after considering the whole field and after trying to find out the metals that we could eliminate, we saw that the prospect of trouble in the future was so imminent that we decided we had better put them in here, as the metals would not be handled under this power if they could be handled without it.

I want to refer to another objection of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] with regard to putting the Government into the mining business. I think the chairman of the committee [Mr. HENDERSON] very ably explained what was intended by that provision of the bill. It is not to put the Government in the mining business. On the other hand, we want to keep the Government out of the mining business so long as it can be done. But take at least some of the metals here. I will mention graphite, for instance. In one section of the country there is a most valuable graphite mine, but it is in litigation and is not being worked. The owners of the property are unable to get the matter decided, to get the title clear, so that either of them can work the property. It is idle, although large quantities can be produced. If it is necessary to secure graphite for the purpose of conducting the war, then I say give some governmental agency the power to take over that mine and work it.

Take sulphur, which can be obtained from a great many of the smelters of the country in quantity, provided the owners of the smelter company will put in a considerable investment—a large investment, in fact—in order to reclaim the sulphur which is disappearing in the fumes; but they are not going to do it, because at the prices which obtained prior to the war they were not justified in doing it from a commercial standpoint. With the present crisis, however, they are more than willing to do it, provided they are assured of a market for a reasonable length of time. So in that case, when we need the sulphur with which to make the sulphuric acid, why should we not say to the smelter company, "We will take so much of your sulphur at a given price, delivered within a given period of time," in order to justify the smelter company in reclaiming the sulphur? So with these other metals we want to encourage production; we must have these minerals for the war. What other remedy can you suggest? I ask any Senator to propose any scheme which will probably solve this problem in a better way than that which is presented by the committee. You do not want a minimum price.

Take one other case, referred to by the Senator from Colorado, where some metal was selling at $2.50 per pound. It was not long until they discovered a whole mountain of it in the State of Colorado. Suppose you had put a minimum price of $2.50 a pound, which should continue for the next year or two years, where would the Government have been? You can not put a minimum guarantee on metals of this class. If you do, you run the risk of bankrupting the Government. If you do not guarantee some sort of a price, you prevent increased production. So the way in which to make the guarantee is to go to the individual who has the mine, who has the prospect, and guarantee to him to take a sufficient quantity of his ore at a sufficient price to justify him in producing the ore. Who can suggest a better scheme? If there is any other scheme to be proposed, I am satisfied the committee will be only too glad to receive a suggestion.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have not interrupted my colleague to ask a specific question, because there are three or four questions which I should like to have answered, and I prefer to suggest them all at once, so that they may be answered separately or together.

In the first place, I should like to know exactly what it is the purpose of the Government to do with the ores of the minerals which it is to purchase. It is not to purchase simply the product, the minerals after they are extracted, but also to purchase the ores of the minerals. I do not see any provision in the bill that the Government shall handle the ores in any way. Is it the purpose simply that the Government may contract for the mineral itself with a party who is already engaged in the extraction of the mineral, and then that the Government shall purchase the ores from a prospector or a miner who has discovered them and shall simply have those ores treated by private plants? There is, I believe, no provision for the Government treating the ores.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the bill contemplates the handling, I will say, of "mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds thereof." So I take it, as to a given metal, that the agency of the Government which is created in this bill would handle the product at the particular stage where its purpose is best to be accomplished.

Mr. FALL. If the Government itself does not purchase the ores it will offer no inducement to the miner who has not a plant. If it is going to induce the miner to produce more ore, especially where the particular mineral mentioned here in such ore would be, as it generally is, a side product or a by-product of such ore, the Government must purchase the ore.

I was merely interested to learn how it was proposed to handle these ores, for the purpose of the bill, as I understand it has been announced by the members of the committee who have referred to it, is to induce the production of more ores containing these metals, the opening up of more mines.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FALL. I yield. I am asking for information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from New Mexico will read section 3 he will find this language:

SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to requisition and take over any of said necessaries, to provide storage facilities for and to store the same, and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same; and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped, insufficiently developed or operated, or idle land or deposit, mine, smelter, or plant, or part thereof, producing or, in his judgment, capable of producing, said necessaries and to develop and operate the same, either through the agencies hereinafter mentioned, or under lease or royalty agreement, or in any other manner.

Mr. FALL. Yes; I had read that, and that was the reason why I was trying to get the ideas of the committee as to whether the Government would first contract for ores, and then, not being able to extract the mineral, to sell them to some one who would reduce them and extract it. For instance, radium is a product of three particular ores. Does the Government propose to contract for the ores from which radium is derived and then to sell those ores to some one who is engaged in the business of extracting the radium from them, or does it propose to commandeer the concentrators or other plants for the reduction of radium itself? If so, it strikes me that the powers given to the corporation in this bill—this I suggest merely from a cursory examination of the bill—are scarcely broad enough.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee I desire to say that it is not the purpose to interfere with the existing machinery for the handling of these ores and metals any more than is absolutely necessary in order to bring about an increased production. Some of the terms used in the bill will not apply to all classes of ores. As my colleague well knows, all ores are not handled alike, and the process of producing a commercial metal from one ore is not the same as to other ores. The terms of this bill were simply made as broad as they are for the purpose of touching the situation at the point where it would cause the least inconvenience and would bring about the best result. That is why the word "alloys" was used in the bill, and also the words "metallurgical products." As to the metals which are alloys or products which go through a particular chemical and metallurgical process, through various reduction and refining plants, it was intended to have those terms broad enough to confer the power to deal with these various metals in a practical way.

Mr. FALL. The wording of the bill interested me where it reads:

The following named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products—

I could understand that, of course.

Metals—

I can understand that, and even "alloys." I might possibly understand "chemical compounds."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am merely going to state to my colleague that, owing to the suggestion of the Senator from Arizona (Mr. SMITH), who criticized that language later on, I was going to suggest a modification of it so as to remove all doubt. The modification which I had thought of suggesting—and, by the way, I will ask my colleague to pay attention to it, and, if it does not meet his views, I shall be more than glad to receive any further suggestions—was, beginning on line 22, to change the language to read thus:

To provide for an equitable and better distribution of certain mineral substances, ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds thereof, to wit—

Then follow the names of those articles. I think, as thus amended, the purpose is perfectly clear, and the language would apply only to just what is intended to be included.

Mr. FALL. The idea that suggests itself to me, and one that I should like to understand how it can be worked out, is this: Antimony, of course, is a mineral; arsenic and the other substances mentioned here are minerals; the bill not only refers to minerals or to chemical compounds thereof but to the ores of the minerals.

So far as the miner is concerned, he is most interested in having a market for his ores; he very seldom handles the mineral itself, which is the product of his ores. That is the first proposition.

The second proposition is, Is the Government in its power of requisition to be restricted to the ores of such minerals as are mentioned here whether the specific mineral constitutes the greater value of such ore or not? Is it to be left to commandeer ores, for instance antimonial ores of silver, where the value of the silver would be 500 times that of the antimony? Is it to be restricted to the carnotite ores from which radium is produced, or can it also requisition pitchblende ores from which radium was formerly produced until the discovery of carnotite deposits of which are found in Colorado almost exclusively? If the Government is to have the power to requisition pitchblende ores, for example, it would then, of course, unless confined to such pitchblende ores as those of which radium constitutes the principal value, have power to commandeer all gold, and particularly gold and copper mines in which pitchblende is found in combination. Is that the intention? I presume it is not, for radium presumably is the substance aimed at here as one of the peculiar or precious metals.

The Government has already tried the radium industry for itself through the loan of a factory and the use of carnotite ores given to it, and I think it has discovered, despite all the talk here three years ago or more, that radium could be produced by private individuals and bought by the Government at much less than it was possible for the Government to produce it, even with the loan of a complete plant, which had been turned over to it, and with such ores as it could obtain even by gift.

Those are questions, of course, that may not suggest themselves as being of such importance to the members of the committee as I place upon them, but it strikes me that there must be some provision for answering them, or else the very object which would induce some of us to vote for this bill would not be obtained.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that no Senator connected with the Committee on Mines and Mining has any particular pride of opinion in respect to the language of this bill.

Mr. FALL. I understand that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And they are perfectly willing to accept any suggestion that will tend to perfect the bill. We have considered and framed this bill in an effort to get a more satisfactory measure. As it came to us it was not only crude but embodied principles to which not one of us would subscribe. It has been amended and put in its present form, but if other suggestions can be made by the Senator from New Mexico or any other Senator which will improve the bill we shall be glad to have them do so. In fact, I understand it is contemplated, in order to give Senators an opportunity to examine into the bill to-morrow, to adjourn over until Wednesday.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course my sole object now is to make these suggestions in order that they may be borne in mind, if deemed worthy of consideration, by the Members of the committee who had the preparation of the bill in hand and who are much more familiar with its language and exactly what they intended to do than I am.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suggest to the Senator that the best way to get the opinion of the committee in the matter would be for him to frame the exact language which he desires incorporated in the bill.

Mr. FALL. When I understand exactly what the committee want, which I am trying to arrive at now by my questions, then I will have much less trouble in undertaking to frame any amendment which I may desire to offer. For that reason I have asked as to what provision is intended as to the treatment of ores of certain minerals and as to what the committee had in mind as to the mineral value of such ores. For instance, pyrites might be a by-product of copper mines, and yet of the two minerals the copper might constitute a very much greater value of the ore, just as silver and gold are a by-product of copper mines. The majority of minerals, aside from the earthy minerals that the committee has mentioned, are obtained as by-products of other minerals and from the extraction of other minerals.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think that it was the intention of the committee to provide that if the Government wanted a certain mineral that is referred to in the bill that it should go to the miners, seek them out or advertise for them, and contract for the desired mineral.

Mr. FALL. The Senator will understand my question was directed to the requisitioning feature, the commandeering feature of the bill; that is, is it the object or the idea of the committee that minerals such as copper would be subject to the commandeering feature of this bill because by-products such as antimony or other minerals mentioned specifically herein might be obtained in the treatment of copper ore?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think it was the intention of the committee that that should be the case.

Mr. FALL. Then I think that language should be guarded.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Perhaps that is true.

Mr. FALL. Now, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what is intended by the provision from line 20, on page 23, down to and including line 3, on the following page? I will ask the Senator first to allow me to call his attention to the following language in the report of Secretary Lane, which I find accompanying this bill:

The Government may enforce economies in the preparation and use of the different commodities.

It seems to me from Secretary Lane's language that he had in view much more than simply the inducement to the miner to produce more metal, and the formation of a company, which in fact would be merely a metals buying and selling company, in order that the United States might have the advantage of distributing such minerals as it brought under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, Mr. President, it was the object to have these minerals or ores allocated.

Mr. FALL. Yes; I understand that; but that is not the sole object or one of the principal objects set forth by the Secretary.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think also there is included the power so to regulate the quantity as to promote its economical use. I think there is a provision in the bill which relates to that; in fact, great powers are given under this bill for the very purpose of bringing about a more efficient administration.

Mr. FALL. That is exactly what I am driving at, Mr. President. I hope the Senator will allow me now to propound my question. I have simply called his attention to the words used by the Secretary as a foundation preliminary to the question which I propose to ask, and upon the answer to that, I will say to the Senator, will depend my support or opposition to this bill as it is now drawn.

The Government may enforce——

Mr. SHAFROTH. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. FALL. I am reading from Secretary Lane's report as a preliminary foundation to a question which I propose to ask:

The Government may enforce economies in the preparation and use of the different commodities.

Now, bearing in mind that language, I find an apparent attempt, in so far as I can understand it, to carry it out. Commencing in line 20, on page 23, I find in the bill the following language:

The President is authorized to require statements and reports, to examine books and papers, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem appropriate for carrying out the purposes of this act, including the operation of any such land, deposit, mine, smelter or plant, or part thereof, the purchase, use, sale, or other disposition of articles or substances used, manufactured, produced, or mined therein, and the employment, control, and compensation of employees.

What does that mean?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It means that in the event the Government should deem it wise to take over any of these mines or a smelter and to operate the same, in order to get the best results, the President must have, and should have, the right to examine the books and papers and practically the means of operating and administering the institution itself.

Mr. FALL. Of course, if the Government takes it over and operates it, it will have the books; it will be keeping its own books, and it will be paying its own men, and, if that is the object, I have no objection to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think that is the object; I do not think of any other object.

Mr. FALL. Well, Mr. President, it is so broad in its terms that it would carry out, in my judgment, exactly what the Secretary has stated here, and for that reason I read his language in connection with the bill. It is so broad in its terms that it made the impression upon me that it was the intention to allow the Government of the United States to go into the private office of any mine or any smelter or any reduction company and not only to go through their books and enforce, as the Secretary has suggested, economies in the production of the minerals, but even to fix the wages of the employees.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think that is the intention.

Mr. FALL. If that is not the purpose, then it is easy enough to so state in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think that any such construction can fairly be placed on it.

Mr. FALL. Very well, then; we can easily arrive at it. If it is the sole purpose of the committee to provide that the Government itself may conduct such operations, those words alone are amply sufficient, because, of course, if the Government operates a plant the Government keeps its own books or has them kept by Government employees, and the Government fixes wages, just as any private employer would do, so it would not be necessary to employ language of this character. If it is necessary to use this language at all in this bill, then it can only, in my judgment, be for the purpose which I have indicated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I take it that this bill does not intend to interfere with private business in any particular, only with such as it may have contractual relations with——

Mr. FALL. Exactly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Or which it operates.

Mr. FALL. That is what I am talking about. It contracts, as the Senator says, for two years ahead for the purpose of securing minerals, and having a contractual relation with the miner, then it is proposed to give the Government power to do all these things. If that is the purpose, if that is the object, if that is the meaning, then you give the Government the power to fix the wages of every miner in the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think there is a single member of the committee who ever dreamed of such a thing.

Mr. FALL. I am glad to have that assurance, because that is my particular objection to the bill. Mr. President, I shall have nothing further to say at this time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until Wednesday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, September 11, 1918, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 9, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art supremely wise, all powerful, and whose essence is love, help us to rededicate ourselves, mind and soul, to Thee at the beginning of this a new congressional week, that our work may be worthy as true sons of the living God, and thus have our part in the spreading of Thy kingdom throughout the world, when all men shall know Thee and worship Thee as Father and live together as brothers in peace and harmony in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 7, 1918, was read and approved.

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House to allow me to have read into the RECORD a very beautiful tribute paid by Gen. Degoutte to the American armies who fought under his command in the second Battle of the Marne. I also ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute before this tribute is read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, on the 11th day of August, 1918, Gen. Degoutte, who commanded the American troops in the second Battle of the Marne, handed me at his headquarters in France an order which he had just issued, which is in itself a very handsome and well-merited tribute to the fighting forces of America. This order, of course, is in the French language. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has assisted me in its translation, and I have no doubt the translation is absolutely correct. The first part of the order refers to the fighting of the marines at Belleau Wood and the second part of it to the fighting covering many days at the second Marne, where the American troops assisted in driving back the Germans. Its value is not only in its praise of the American soldiers but is increased because of the high authority from which it comes. I will be obliged to the House if they will listen to it while it is read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

VI[e] ARMÉE,
P. C., le 9 Août 1918.

ORDRE GÉNÉRAL.

Avant la grande offensive du 18 Juillet, les troupes américaines faisant partie de la VI[e] Armée française se sont distinguées en enlevant à l'ennemi le Bois de la Brigade de Marine et le village de Vaux, en arrêtant son offensive sur la Marne et à Fossoy.

Depuis, elles ont pris la part la plus glorieuse à la deuxième Bataille de la Marne, rivalisant d'ardeur et de vaillance avec les troupes françaises. Elles ont, en vingt jours de combats incessants, libéré de nombreux villages français et réalisé, à travers un pays difficile, une avance de 40 kilomètres qui les a portées au-delà de la Vesle.

Leurs glorieuses étapes sont marquées par des noms qui illustreront, dans l'avenir, l'Historie militaire des Etats-Unis: Torcy, Belleau, Plateau d'Étrepilly, Épieds, Le Charmel, l'Ourcq, Seringes-et-Nesles, Sergy, La Vesle, et Fismes.

Les jeunes Divisions qui voyaient le feu pour la première fois se sont montrées dignes des vieilles traditions guerrières de l'Armée régulière. Elles ont eu la même volonté ardente de battre le Boche, la même discipline qui fait que l'ordre donné par le Chef est toujours exécuté, quels que soient les difficultés à vaincre et les sacrifices à consentir.

Les magnifiques résultats atteints sont dûs à l'énergie et à l'habileté des Chefs, à la bravoure des Soldats.

Je suis fier d'avoir commandé de telles troupes.

DEGOUTTE,
Le Général Commandant la VI[e] Armée.

[Translation.]

SIXTH ARMY,
COMMANDING POST,
August 9, 1918.

GENERAL ORDER.

Before the great offensive of July 18, the American troops, forming part of the Sixth French Army, distinguished themselves by clearing the "Brigade de Marine" Woods and the village of Vaux from the enemy and arresting his offensive on the Marne and at Fossoy.

Since then, they have taken the most glorious part in the second Battle of the Marne, rivaling the French troops in ardor and valor.

During 20 days of constant fighting they have freed numerous French villages and made, across a difficult country, an advance of 40 kilometers, which has brought them to the Vesle.

Their glorious marches are marked by names which will shine in future in the military history of the United States: Torcy, Belleau, Plateau d'Etrepilly, Epieds, Le Charmel, l'Ourcq, Seringes-et-Nesles, Sergy, La Vesle et Fismes.

These young divisions, who saw fire for the first time, have shown themselves worthy of the old war traditions of the Regular Army. They have had the same burning desire to fight the Boche, the same discipline which sees that the order given by their commander is always executed, whatever the difficulties to be overcome and the sacrifices to be suffered.

The magnificent results obtained are due to the energy and the skill of the commanders; to the bravery of the soldiers.

I am proud to have commanded such troops.

DEGOUTTE,
The Commanding General of the Sixth Army.

[Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, is there any way in which the fact that this has been read here can be certified to and sent to this commanding officer? It was his express desire that this order should be read to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARNER. Send him a copy of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The House can make an order to that effect if it wants to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Did not the One hundred and tenth Pennsylvania, which comes from the twenty-second district, that I represent, take part in that fight, and is it not among those mentioned in this order?

Mr. BUTLER. They were, indeed, in that fight, and I fear many of them will never fight again. If it is proper to do so, I ask unanimous consent that an engrossed copy be sent to Gen. Degoutte under the seal of the House, so that he may know that it was read here in accordance with the promise I made to him on Sunday morning, August 11, 1918.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, an engrossed copy of this, signed by the Speaker and Clerk of the House, with the seal of the House affixed to it, will be sent to Gen. Degoutte.

Mr. HARDY. I will ask if that may not be accompanied by a copy, also, of the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in presenting it?

Mr. BUTLER. I am very grateful to my friend from Texas, but I would rather that it would appear just as having been read here. That was his request. He did not ask me to say anything. He wanted the American people to know the high estimate in which these troops are held in France.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the order will be made.

PROHIBITION IN ESTABLISHED WAR-PLANT ZONES.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] may be recognized to call up S. J. Res. 172, authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed; that he may call it up under the general rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], chairman of the Judiciary Committee, be permitted to call up S. J. Res. 172 under the general rules of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, if this resolution is called up, will it be open to amendment or will it be considered as it passed the Senate? The reason I ask that is because I dislike to see the time of the House taken up in debate to the detriment of the revenue bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The bill is upon the House Calendar. It will be within the power of the gentleman from North Carolina to move the previous question at any time.

Mr. DYER. I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina does he propose to open this resolution up to amendment, to take in everything else besides what the resolution covers?

Mr. WEBB. I will state to my friend that I hope the resolution will pass this House just as it passed the Senate and as reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee, without any amendment.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield time to anybody to offer amendments?

Mr. WEBB. If I were to yield time to any gentleman to offer an amendment, I think I would lose the floor. Of course any gentleman who desires to do so, under the rules of the House, will have the opportunity to make a motion to recommit.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman propose to yield the floor to allow amendments to be offered?

Mr. WEBB. To be perfectly frank with the gentleman, I do not.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think the gentleman from North Carolina had better shut himself off from that, because some amendment might be necessary to perfect the bill. I do not think the gentleman had better promise not to allow any amendments.

Mr. GARNER. What he suggested was that he would not yield the floor to permit anyone else to offer an amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. I was afraid he was going to bind himself that the resolution should not be amended.

Mr. GARNER. No; he does not bind himself not to offer any amendment himself.

Mr. GILLETT. All right.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am making this request simply in order to save time. I have a privileged report from the Committee on Rules. I am merely making this request in order that the debate may be had upon the resolution rather than upon the rule.

Mr. DYER. I am in favor of the resolution as it passed the Senate and have no objection to its consideration. I only thought it would not be well to allow it to be open to amendment, to take in everything else, and take up the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. In view of the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina that he does not propose to yield for the offering of amendments, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire recognition?

Mr. CANNON. I am heartily in favor of the resolution, but I do not believe there ought to be any amendment offered thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the question of allowing amendments to be offered to this resolution will be entirely in the control of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. He has a right to move the previous question whenever he gets ready. If he yields to some gentleman to offer an amendment, he loses the floor, and he can shut out amendments if he wants to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Senate joint resolution 172 be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this joint resolution, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I think the House thoroughly understands the meaning of this resolution and desire its immediate passage. I want to say that the Acting Secretary of War, Mr. Benedict Crowell, told me Saturday that he regarded it as a very pressing matter and hoped that the House would act as speedily as the rules would permit, and that is the occasion of the committee's bringing in a rule this morning. I am glad the House is in favor of considering it without the rule, and I think would be glad to have me move the previous question, which I now do.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, this says that the President is authorized to establish zones. I wondered if it ought not to allow him not only to establish zones, but to change them, if necessary, or terminate them.

Mr. GARNER. He can; he can establish new zones.

Mr. GILLETT. He can establish zones for 10 miles, but could he reduce it to 5 miles?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He could change them in any way he saw fit, or he could revoke them.

Mr. GILLETT. It seems to me that that does not follow, but if satisfactory to the House and the House thinks it sufficient, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, with Mr. HAMLIN temporarily in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this internal revenue bill will impose the largest amount of taxes upon the people of the United States that was ever carried in any tax bill by any legislative body in the world; in fact, I can say without fear of successful contradiction that it carries more than double the amount of taxes incorporated in any bill ever presented to a law-making body in any country in the world.

But in support of this we, the people of the United States, possess more wealth, twice over, than any like population in any country in the world.

I appeal to every man within the sound of my voice and to the people of our country to give loyal support to this bill and to our Government. We are engaged in the greatest struggle between powerful nations of the world that was ever known.

I appeal to you to give loyal support to this measure, because the Government has called upon our people to give our sons, husbands, and brothers, between the ages of 18 and 45 years, to go to the battlefields of Europe, to offer up their lives if need be, in order to protect our families and our homes from the ravages of a savage enemy.

I recently visited the Walter Reed Government Hospital in this city, where at present there are hundreds of our soldiers who have returned from France, some minus a leg or an arm, or both, some who have lost an eye, and some who are blind. A visit to that hospital is sufficient evidence to us what this war means to our soldiers who go over there. It is our duty, the duty of every father, mother, brother, and sister left behind, to do everything possible to help win the war; it is our duty to provide food, clothing, ammunition, and arms to our loved ones that have gone to the battle fields to fight for liberty.

In the future, on the part of our Government, there must be no tendency toward territorial acquisition, no tendency to give greater power to individuals. On the part of all the nations of the world there must be maintained a high regard for treaty obligations; people must understand that sacred contracts between nations must be looked upon as more than a "mere scrap of paper." This war will undoubtedly bring about a new order of things, and the efforts of the best men will be needed to solve new problems. Things heretofore thought to be quite impracticable may become the order of the times.

We are engaged in a conflict for human liberty. The rights of all nations must be respected; the weak made strong by the guaranty of the powerful.

The money to be raised by this new tax measure is for the purpose of enabling this great, rich, and powerful Nation to take its part in this world's war for the greater liberty of mankind the world over. We, being rich in money and men, must give freely to the cause now that we are in this war. The cost of the war to the whole world, in money and in blood, is beyond comprehension. Should the war continue for another year the financial cost to the people of the United States for the calendar year 1919, because of the probable growth of our Army and our Navy, will exceed the total expenses of this Federal Government from its foundation down to the year 1913, including the cost of the Civil War.

We must be prepared to meet this great expense, if need be. The wealth of this Nation from the year 1910 to the year 1918 increased more than $10,000,000,000 annually, until at the present time the wealth of the United States exceeds that of the three greatest nations of the world—$265,000,000,000.

As an illustration of the duty of the people of this country to support our soldiers on the battle fields of Europe, I wish to quote from a little booklet written by Kenneth Graham Duffield, which I think quite proper at this time:

Somebody's boy has crossed th' sea.
To do the fightin' fer you and me.
Let's call him "Bill"—he's any man's son
That carries a pack an' shoulders a gun.

Over in France in th' dirt and mud,
There's a boy uv ours;
He said he'd fight till th' war wuz through,
And leave th' rest t' me an' you.
We promised t' help in every way;
If we couldn't fight we said we'd pay.
It's up t' us, we can if we will;
Let's stop our fussin' and pull for Bill.

[Applause.]

What does it matter when all is done,
T' you an' me,
T' keep our money, but lose th' fight,
An' bend our necks to th' German's might?
Let's learn to save an' go without;
Our money is talkin'—let's make it shout.
Its up t' us, we can if we will;
Lets pull together an' pull fer Bill.

It's easy t' stand a wheatless day
If it's helping Bill.
We'd rather be cold than have it said
We used th' coal when he needed bread.
It isn't much, an' it's rather small
T' give so little when he gives all.
It's up t' us, we can if we will;
Let's stand together an' stand by Bill.

[Applause.]

How would you like t' take his place
Out on th' front?
How would you like t' be young and strong,
A-doin' your part t' right th' wrong?
Your part's at home—it's hard, I know,
T' stand aside when th' others go.
It's up t' us, we can if we will;
We'll pull together—we're all for Bill.

[Applause.]

My friends, the money to be raised by this bill is to carry out our pledge to our beloved boys across the sea, fighting for liberty for mankind the world over.

I am ready to contribute my share; I will go to the extreme. I am going to point out the things in this bill that do not meet my approval, and I am going to tell you why they do not meet my views; but when the time comes to vote, whether there are amendments made to the bill or not, I shall vote for the bill [applause], and I appeal to all men to do likewise. It requires money to win this war, and I am going to explain before I conclude my remarks the amount of money necessary as estimated. My good friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] well said the other day, on Friday, in his remarks that in the preparation of this bill in the committee there were no signs of partisanship. No man could have come into the room, as he said, and sat there and heard the arguments for and against measures put into the bill and have told which were Republicans and which were Democrats. When Democrats and Republicans agree it reminds me of the story of a man who met the great show king, P. T. Barnum. Speaking about the wild animals in his show, Mr. Barnum said that it was all nonsense that wild animals should disagree and devour one another, that he was going to show the world that he could teach wild animals to live together and agreeably and love one another.

He said, "I am going to put in one cage a bear, a panther, a lion, a wolf, a dog, and a lamb, and I am going to make them live together happily as one family." Well, the friend said, "I would like to see how you come out." Some two or three weeks afterwards the friend met Mr. Barnum and said, "How are you coming along with your wild animals in the one cage?" Barnum replied, "Pretty well, but it is taking a hell of a lot of lambs." [Laughter.]

My friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made a great speech; one, I believe, of the greatest speeches ever made on the floor of the House. It will go down in history as such. He had a great subject to talk about. He talked about a great bill, and, by the way, that reminds me that a friend wrote me the other day in reference to the bill and said, "Please send me a copy; I understand it is a bill of some size." [Laughter.] Yes; it is of some size. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] referred to the tariff. I had intended to say very little about duties being imposed upon imports, but my friend has opened the door, and I feel that I must answer some of the statements which he made, for I think he is mistaken in his calculations or in his statistics. He stated that prices after the war would go down and that profits would go down likewise.

He may be correct in that opinion and he may be in error, for no man knows. I look for an era of prosperity to the industries of this country after the war, to all industries except those that are engaged in the production of munitions of war. This war has devastated a great territory in Europe, destroyed everything within its wake, all of which must be rebuilt. It will be hastily rebuilt. Temporary structures will be put up. Twenty millions of men have been engaged for four years in destroying life and property instead of producing. The production of industries of the world has been retarded. When the war has ceased—and God knows we all hope that it may cease in the near future—people now engaged in taking each other's lives will become engaged in natural pursuits, in the production of manufactured articles and in agriculture. As we are one of the great manufacturing countries of the world, and the richest Nation in the world, in my opinion, we will receive great benefits from the demand for products of every description, manufactured and agricultural, after the war is over. Therefore, he may be in error when he says that profits may go down when prices go down. Profits may be equally as good then as now, undoubtedly equally as good as for any period during normal times in the history of the country. Such was the case after the Civil War.

It is estimated that the expenditures of our Government this fiscal year will be $24,000,000,000. Six billions of those twenty-four billion we propose to loan to our allies. Therefore, our expenditures will be in round numbers $18,000,000,000 for the fiscal year.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves the question of after-the-war conditions, has he ever thought that practically all Europe will be an importing country in the way of raw materials, rather than an exporting country, and that we will have to import into Europe to build up that country large amounts of our products?

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps that may be true; but we will have a great demand for raw material that we do not produce ourselves, as will Great Britain, France, and all other countries. That is a matter that will adjust itself the world over, in my opinion.

In the first place, let me say that I have at all times been opposed to raising by taxation such a large percentage of our expenditures. I do not believe anyone will contend that the money we propose to loan to our allies should now be raised by taxation. So far as we know and we believe, the money we are loaning to our allies will be paid back to us with interest, and it is proposed—whatever we may decide to do in the future—to tax them a rate of interest equal to that which we pay on our Government bonds sold in this country. So that if they meet their obligations to us, both in principal and in interest, we should not now raise this amount by taxation, but we should borrow the money to loan to them. Therefore, if our expenditures are $18,000,000,000 a year, $8,000,000,000 raised by taxation means 45 per cent of our expenditures raised by direct taxes. No such sum was raised by any country in the history of the world. No such proportion to the total expenditures is being raised at the present time by any country now at war.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Was not the $18,000,000,000 estimate made in May, months before the new draft law was presented to Congress for its adoption?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is true, but it was made in anticipation of a great Army.

Mr. SLOAN. Are not the $18,000,000,000 probably an underestimate in contemplation of what we would have to pay?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know; I did not make the estimates. The estimates came from the Treasury Department, and I believe were made in anticipation of a greatly increased Army and Navy.

Now, let me show you what our allied nations are doing in the way of taxing their people in proportion to their total expenditures. Great Britain's tax laws—a copy of which I have with me here, which I received from our ambassador in London, England, a few weeks ago—Great Britain's expenditures this year—that is, her tax—in proportion to her total expenditures is shown to be 28 per cent, the largest percentage of total expenditures raised by taxation by any country with which we are connected in this war.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman please tell us how much the first year in proportion?

Mr. FORDNEY. Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. LAZARO. The first year?

Mr. FORDNEY. During their last fiscal year ending the 31st of March, 1918, their total collection by taxes in proportion to their total expenses was 25 per cent. They have increased that sum this year.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to ask if the proportion in any year was any greater?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir. That is the greatest ever imposed by them since the war. Canada is raising 18½ per cent of her expenditures by taxation and the balance from the sale of bonds. France is raising 11 per cent in taxation and borrowing the balance. Italy is raising 9 per cent by taxation and borrowing 91 per cent of her total expenditures; and for us to raise by taxation at this time 45 per cent of our total expenditures is a greater sum, in my opinion, than should be imposed upon the people of the country.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does this 28 per cent England is raising by taxation this year include loans to her allies?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir; that is her expenditures, if I am correct. That is my recollection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman is wrong about that—I am pretty sure he is—that that does include loans to her allies.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is $33,000,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It includes loans to allies, I think.

Mr. FORDNEY. Maybe the gentleman is right, but in my opinion he is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman from Ohio is correct. The $33,000,000,000 also includes $3,000,000,000 bonded indebtedness Great Britain had when the war broke out.

Mr. FORDNEY. That means her total annual expenditures; but we had at the beginning of this war some bonded indebtedness also, the interest upon which is included in these estimated expenditures of ours. This $18,000,000,000 we are proposing to raise and expend this year includes all our expenditures of every nature and description. The gentleman from North Carolina referred to a panic. He is conscientious; he may be right, and I may be wrong. He is afraid of a panic. Panics usually come from industrial wars and not from wars upon the battle field. We certainly had panicky times in the country during the Civil War, but it was because of the great distress, the great loss of life and property to both the North and South. We think now we have high prices, my friends, due to this war largely, but during the Civil War my father paid $30 a barrel for flour in the State of Indiana. We have not reached that point here yet. Kerosene sold at 75 to 80 cents per gallon and sugar 75 cents a pound, and hard to obtain at that. Calico goods sold at 50 cents a yard and other articles of use in proportion to those prices.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me conclude this statement. I was a boy living with my parents on a farm in Indiana and I did not eat white bread for two years. I lived on corn bread; was unable to get wheat bread; they would not let us use wheat; they wanted it to make bread for the soldiers in the war. I lived—well, a pretty good specimen of health, and grew up on corn bread.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. The prices the gentleman quotes were in a depreciated currency, were they not, by reason——

Mr. FORDNEY. These prices were in the gold value of the dollar; the depreciated currency came later on. The increased prices were exceptionally high in your depreciated currency. The value of the greenbacks went to about 30 cents on the dollar. That would make the flour only $10 a barrel in gold; but, my good friends, wheat sold at $5.50 per bushel in gold. You can not have $10 flour on $5.50 wheat.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Is not the fundamental reason that there was that disparity between paper money and gold because not sufficient bonds were issued by the Government to defray the war expenses and maintain the bonds at par, not enough raised by taxation——

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not attribute that cause alone to the depreciated currency. There was a time, my good friends, when the North lost many great battles, which discouraged our people of the North in the purchase of bonds and in taking our paper currency guaranteed by the Government. They were afraid that our Government was going to fail, just as the government of the Southern States failed.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. HARDY. I would say, down with us for some years after the war, flour bread was only a Sunday luxury and we ate corn bread during the week.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Speaking of depreciated currency, currency was depreciated later in the Civil War, but while our currency is at a parity with gold now gold itself in its purchasing capacity has fallen off one-half, and whoever has security payable in gold dollars can buy half or less than half on the average now than he could have bought when this war broke out.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is right. Prices are high.

Mr. CANNON. Or gold is low?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said, "During the Civil War," if I remember him correctly, "we raised 70 per cent of our expenditures from taxes."

Mr. KITCHIN. No; if the gentleman will permit, I said if the act of 1864 had been passed in 1861, then we would have raised 70 per cent. In other words, the tax of 1864 for four years after its passage produced 70 per cent of our total expenditures during the war valued in the gold dollar.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not understand the gentleman correctly, but it is a fact——

Mr. KITCHIN. I stated during the war—four years—we only collected $729,455,000 in taxes and customs. This possibly includes a few millions of dollars of miscellaneous receipts, but four years after the act of 1864 we collected a billion, six hundred and eighty-one million dollars, which, in gold value, was 70 per cent of the Government's expenditures during the war.

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, I obtained the information which I now give from a history of the expense of the Civil War, a copy of which was sent to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, and was written by a man by the name of Dewey, in which the author states that for every $1 raised by taxation during the Civil War we borrowed $5.09. In other words, we raised by taxation about 16 per cent of our expenditures and borrowed the balance.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will just permit me there, I will give exactly what the statistics show. We raised in the four years of the Civil War $729,455,000 in taxes. We issued bonds to the amount of $2,565,233,000. We only received in gold value for those bonds $1,695,347,000. Those figures are taken from the Treasury reports and found in the Statistical Abstract. Now, one thing, of course, that does not show in the Statistical Abstract or in the Treasury Department, and the gentleman did point it out, I think, in his speech of last year—and it was the first such information I had—was that the States did raise, perhaps, several hundred million dollars to help out the Federal Government. That was not included. I remember the gentleman did include that in his speech of last year.

Mr. FORDNEY. And much of that was raised by bonds as well as taxes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was referring to what the Federal Government expended and received from taxes and bonds.

Mr. FORDNEY. In all events, gentlemen, we are raising more money now in proportion to our total expenditure—we are raising more money by the terms of this bill than any country in the world, so far as I can find from history, ever attempted to raise in time of war, in proportion to our total expenditures. And I think we are raising too much. If this war is being fought for the freedom of mankind the world over and the coming generation is to enjoy that freedom as our people of to-day enjoy the fruits of our wars in the past, I believe it is not fair to ask the people of this country at the present time, and especially the men upon the battle field, to fight the battles now and pay the bills, too. To fight this great war and pay a reasonable portion of the bills is all that ought to be expected of the people at this time. Notwithstanding the fact that many men disagree with me, I believe that I am correct in this view.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. This 45 per cent is predicated upon $18,000,000,000 being spent?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman believe that inasmuch as they were only able to spend between seven and eight billions of dollars the last fiscal year that it would be possible for the producers of this country to produce sufficient in order that the Government would be able to spend this $18,000,000,000 that we are talking about raising?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have my doubts, my friend, that our expenditures are going to be $18,000,000,000.

Mr. SNYDER. Then if they will not be able to spend $18,000,000,000, and you raise your $8,000,000,000 by taxes, it will be far more than 45 per cent of the total amount needed. Is that correct?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. The 45 per cent is on the basis of expending $18,000,000,000 this year.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask you a personal question. You do not believe that the Government can spend $18,000,000,000 this fiscal year for its own requirements, do you?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, my good friend, the question would be for me to define what their actual expenditures are. I believe we are spending large sums of money right now unnecessarily. I believe that we are spending money now that should not be so spent.

Mr. SNYDER. So do I.

Mr. FORDNEY. But I have not raised my voice against this extravagance. The responsibility is not upon me or upon the Republican Party as to the expenditures of this Government at this time. It is with the administration, and if it makes such a mistake, asking for the money, asking for the men, and stating that these two things are necessary, calling upon me and upon you, it is our duty to give to it what it says it needs in order to successfully carry on this war. Then when the war is over it will be time enough for you and me and our Democratic friends to settle our political rows.

Mr. SNYDER. I was basing my question upon the assumption that the last fiscal year the Government succeeded in expending for its requirements between seven and eight billion dollars. Now, I maintain that the part of that money that was spent for product can not be increased threefold in any one year.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not believe it can.

Mr. SNYDER. Then, certainly it will be impossible for the Government to spend $18,000,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Before I close I will attempt to show you where the Government can save money they are now spending.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. I understood the gentleman to say it was not right to make the boys fight this war and then pay for it. Is it not a fact that the more we tax war profits that are being made out of this war the less the boys will have to pay when they come back?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, the more we pay of the cost of the war now, no matter where we get the money, the less there will be to pay later on, of course. But, my good friend, in taxing war profits, if you had spent the time that the Ways and Means Committee has spent on hearings and preparing this bill for 13 long weeks, you would understand how difficult it is to define war profits in every industry in the land.

It is a difficult problem to work out. I am perfectly willing, and have lent my most earnest support to this committee, to frame this law in such a manner as to exact from people who are making large war profits the largest possible sum of taxes without injuring them, and I believe we have accomplished that end when I tell you that in war profits we first take 80 per cent above 10 per cent and 12 per cent of what is left. [Applause.] That is a pretty heavy tax. In other words, suppose a firm with $100,000 capital makes 100 per cent, and in some instances which have been brought to our notice more than 1,000 per cent on their capital has been made in Government contract—suppose a firm with $100,000 capital earns $100,000 profit—they are given 10 per cent deduction; first of all, $10,000; then 80 per cent of $90,000, or $72,000 is taken, and from the $28,000 that is left, which includes their deduction, 12 per cent is taken; that added to the war tax leaves them about 25 per cent earnings upon their capital. That is a pretty heavy tax, gentlemen, on war profits.

Now, the law provides two methods of taxing the profits of corporations; one under the excess-profits tax and the other under the war-profits tax. The excess-profits tax provides that after a deduction of 8 per cent on the capital invested, plus $3,000 exemption—and, by the way, I am not satisfied with the definition of "capital" in this law—after deducting 8 per cent, plus the $3,000 exemption, there is a deduction of 35 per cent of 15 per cent of the earnings, which takes 35 per cent between their deduction of 8 per cent, plus $3,000, up to 15 per cent and 50 per cent of 20 per cent of their earnings; and then 70 per cent on all earnings above 20 per cent, and then 12 per cent on what is left. That is a pretty heavy tax. Whichever one of these methods will yield the largest sum to the Government must be applied to the corporation.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose a firm having a Government contract, as fast as it makes it invests its money in new buildings in order to increase production and speed up for the Government. Where is it going to get the money to pay this big tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. It will have to do as I do—borrow it. When these taxes are applied under certain conditions they must borrow. But, my good friend, the attention of the committee was called to a contract over here in Pennsylvania, Hog Island—let me be plain—where the Government had spent $55,000,000 in building up a shipyard. The Government then let a cost-plus contract to a firm, turned over the shipyard to that firm, free of cost, and this firm, as I remember it now, has a capital of $2,000, and they have taken $187,000,000 of contracts from the Government and have the use of the shipyard free of charge.

They are to receive 5 per cent on the cost of their production—the building of ships. It was stated that last year their earnings were $11,000,000 on $2,000 of capital. Energy, of course, and intelligence are given in addition to their capital for the $11,000,000 profit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the gentleman know whether or not they add their income tax, or the tax they pay for income, to the cost of construction?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am glad you asked the question, my friend, for this reason: The information was brought to the committee that contracts had been made by the Government in which the Government agreed to pay taxes imposed by Congress upon their profits on those contracts. Some engineers were called before the committee.

One very intelligent, fine gentleman stated that he came into the employ of the Government in January last, and he knew of no such contract. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], a member of the committee, will explain to this House and will read the exact language in contracts, copies of which we obtained, wherein they are exempt from Government taxes. Some of them are; some of them are not. The man that made that contract for the Government ought to be prosecuted. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Will this bill catch any profits made by these Government contractors which accrued to them before this fiscal year?

Mr. FORDNEY. Not unless their income comes in this year. If it comes in this year I meant to say they will pay taxes under this law. But whatever profits they made for the calendar year 1917 have already been paid for and charged up to them, whether they have paid it or not. If they have not paid it, they are subject to the tax under existing law, and not under this law.

Mr. HARDY. They are not retaxed under this law?

Mr. FORDNEY. Not on what their earnings were last year. Upon what their earnings will be this year they will be taxed under this law.

Mr. HARDY. Their earnings this year are to be taxed under this law?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; for 1918.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman's figures related to the fiscal year?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; it is the calendar year.

Mr. SLOAN. The calendar year will be the year under which this tax will be levied.

Mr. HARDY. It will be the calendar year under this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Government has a fiscal year, but taxes will be collected for the calendar year.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. You are passing from the subject of these contracts. You say that you had a number of men before the committee, and that some of these contracts were investigated. Does the gentleman believe that anybody representing the Government had any authority to relieve anybody from paying the income tax? Was that phase of it investigated?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether they had authority or not, that language is right in the contract, and I know of no power on earth that can abrogate that contract without both parties agreeing to it. If those people have contracts signed by the Government, by the authorities of the Government, that are legal, they are going to hold the Government to those contracts. They certainly will. I do not know of any way by which the Government can get out of it.

Now, my friends, I am going to say but very little about import duties. I do want to criticize my Democratic friends, however, for not resorting to the raising of some of this money from import duties. It is the first time in the history of the world that I ever heard of that a nation engaged in a great war did not increase its import duties some. My good friends, the Democrats, have in their National and State platforms for many years past, for many decades past, stated that they were in favor of a tariff for revenue. But at the same time I am going to show you that they have been for free trade all the time, and are now. There never was a time in the history of the world when a tariff for revenue would be more appropriate than right now.

There never was a time in the history of the world when we needed revenues so badly, and yet you decline to pay any attention to that question whatever.

My friends, let me tell you something that is interesting to me. Our revenues from imports collected last year were, in round numbers, $1.70 per capita, based on 102,000,000 people. Great Britain is the great free-trade country of the world, so recognized the world over. I have so understood it, anyway. Great Britain, with 45,000,000 people, is to-day collecting $460,000,000 revenue from imports, or $10.22 per capita. We are collecting $1.70 per capita. Great Britain does not apply her import taxes scientifically. My good friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] the other day read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a portion of a speech which I made in this House last year, wherein I said that a scientific tariff law could not be prepared and passed through this House in less than seven months. I meant that when I said it. From the time we began the hearings on the Payne tariff law to the time of its passage was nine months. That was the most scientific tariff law ever placed upon our statute books, but I have never heard of a scientific Democratic tariff law. [Applause.]

Now, I do not mean to be sarcastic to my Democratic friends, because we are all one family now in the passage of this bill and the carrying on of this war. My friends, a tariff for revenue only is not a scientific tariff law. It is a tax upon imports, chiefly imposed upon the consumer. A protective-tariff law is a scientific tariff law, to protect our labor and our capital, our industries in this country from ruinous competition from abroad, where cheaper labor can be found. No reasonable man at this time will advocate a protective-tariff law for present use. We do not need it. Our industries do not need it now. The prices of labor and of raw materials and the cost of production all over the world are so abnormally high at this time that competition is not keen. Our industries are not suffering from competition, notwithstanding the fact that our imports to-day are far greater than ever in the history of the country, and 71.92 per cent of all our imports of the last fiscal year were free.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to go on with that statement, but I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. Right there I want to inquire: If we had not had this protective tariff that has developed and extended the great industries, the vast corporations, and the mighty wealth of this country, where could we look to-day for this tax to carry on this war and win it?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have something I will present on that just a little later, if the gentleman will permit me to do so.

Mr. FOCHT. All right.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friends, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said that three-fourths of the articles on the free list in the Underwood tariff law were on the free list in the Payne tariff law. The gentleman from North Carolina is in error in making that statement.

I examined a copy of the Payne tariff law and of the Underwood tariff law, where the rates are given in two columns on the same page, one under the Payne tariff law and one under the Underwood law; and while there are several hundred items on the free list in the Underwood law that were on the protected list in the Payne law, I selected 104 and stopped there. It is true I selected some of the largest imports. And while our imports under the Payne law reached $1,813,000,000 the last year of the life of that law, with 54 per cent of those imports on the free list, the greatest imports in any one year in our history were in the last fiscal year, when our imports were $2,946,000,000, with 71.92 per cent on the free list. And out of 104 items on the free list in existing law that were on the protected list in the Payne law, 25 made up a little less than $900,000,000 of our imports last year. I have 79 more articles yet to figure from, and I did not have more than about half the items in the Underwood law on the free list that were on the protected list under the Payne law in this list of 104 items. So the gentleman from North Carolina is in error and our imports are increasing. I have a letter here from the Treasury Department. Perhaps it is not overly interesting, but the Treasury Department shows that each month this year, giving a few months back of the date of this letter which I received a few weeks ago, our imports are increasing and the free list is increasing.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman kindly touch upon imports from the Orient before he leaves this subject?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. The imports from the Orient are very heavy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman pardon me for a moment?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What figures did the gentleman give as to the portion of the imports that were on the free list for 1917?

Mr. FORDNEY. I took from the Underwood law articles now on the free list that were on the protected list under the Payne law, 104 items, not all that were in the law, and 25 of those items constituted nearly $900,000,000 of our imports last year, the fiscal year of 1917 and 1918. Among them is wool, $198,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What did the gentleman give as the total value of the imports imported free for 1917?

Mr. FORDNEY. The last year of the Payne tariff law was the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am only asking for last year.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to give you the two years to show the comparison. There were imported during the fiscal year 1913, $987,524,000 on the free list and $825,500,000 on the protected list, or 54 per cent free. This last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1918, the free imports were $2,118,000,000 and the imports on the protected list $827,460,000, or in round numbers 72 per cent on the free list.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman give the amount of the imports of wool in the last year the Payne-Aldrich bill was in effect?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. I have only the last year. Some of the years prior to the last year there were more imports than during the last year.

Mr. HARDY. Just give the last year of the Payne-Aldrich law.

Mr. FORDNEY. The imports of all kinds of wool of the first class, second class, and third class were 111,168,000 pounds.

Mr. HARDY. Now, will the gentleman give the imports in pounds for the last year?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me give you a series that I want to put in the RECORD. The value of that wool was $15,890,000. The imports for 1914 were 102,000,000 pounds, and the value was $17,029,000. For 1915 the imports were 65,709,000 pounds, and the value was $10,865,000. The average importations for the years 1913, 1914, and 1915, in round numbers, were 93,000,000 pounds.

For the year 1916 our imports jumped to 534,828,000 pounds, and the value to $142,420,000. For 1917 the imports dropped back to 372,000,000 pounds, the value of which was $131,000,000. This last fiscal year the imports were 379,000,000 pounds, and the value $198,546,000, an average importation for the last three years of 428,000,000 pounds, as against 93,000,000 pounds per year for the previous three years.

Mr. HARDY. Can the gentleman give us at this point the value of the wool manufactures for the same years?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not have the figures here. Immediately on the beginning of hostilities in Europe Great Britain and France called upon us for a large amount of woolen goods. I remember one year our exports went up to $52,000,000, an average of only four or five million during normal times.

Mr. HARDY. So our exports of woolen manufactures have been vastly increased in that period of time?

Mr. FORDNEY. Up to the time we became engaged in the war; since that time the exports of woolen goods have been greatly decreased. We did supply during the first years a very large quantity of woolen goods to the people in Europe.

Mr. HARDY. Are we not even exporting a good deal of manufactured woolen goods now?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; some.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman know how much?

Mr. FORDNEY. For the fiscal year of 1917–18 the value of our exports of woolens were $17,749,421.

We have greatly increased the importation of breadstuffs. It is true that increased value adds to the volume of the imports. If we had the same value of imports to-day that we had during the year 1913, the value of our imports would not show anywhere near as great as they are. But, my good friends, under the Underwood tariff law the major portion of your imports are on an ad valorem basis. While your collections of duties on imports have gone down each year prices of imports have gone up. The difference between a tariff law on a specific basis and an ad valorem basis is this: The specific rate operates so that when the price of the article goes up the ad valorem goes down, and when the value of the article decreases the ad valorem under a specific duty goes up. In other words, if you import $100 worth of goods at a specific duty which amounts to 10 per cent ad valorem you collect that duty upon the quantity and not the value, but if the price of the article goes down from $100 to $50, then the ad valorem rate is 20 per cent instead of 10—if it is a specific duty, right the reverse with your ad valorem rate—because 10 per cent ad valorem on a hundred dollars' value is $10, and if the value of that article advances to $200 your duty would be $20.

Now, there is one very strange thing which I can not quite understand. For the years 1914, 1915, 1916, and along there, our import values of some articles, which we were also exporting, were far below our export values. Let me illustrate: I discovered that we were importing from Canada French white beans, the most valuable beans in the world, at a value given as 60 cents a bushel, and at the same time we were exporting the same beans to Europe at the price of $3.10 a bushel. We were importing horses from Canada on a valuation given, upon which the ad valorem duty was paid, of $27 a head, or $2.07 per head duty. We were exporting the same grade of horses—and Canada has the finest horses to be found in the country or in the world; no better to be found anywhere. Our value of horses exported at the same time was $227 per head. The import value was $27, as I have said. If these horses that came in from Canada had been valued at their true value, as our export horses were valued, they would have paid $27 a head instead of $2.70 a head. That is the difference between the specific and ad valorem rate of duty.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does not that very observation show that we are raising more tax under an ad valorem than we would under a specific duty, that it necessarily has some relation to the value when you fix a specific duty?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. I want to do this much justice to my Democratic friends, who do not believe in specific duties and do believe in ad valorem rates. It is true that specific duties can not be applied to all articles of import because of their varied valuation. As an illustration, take chinaware, which varies anywhere from $5 to $500, owing to the quality of the goods. These values are extreme. To put a tax of $1 on a tea set would mean that if that tea set was valued at $5 the tax would be 20 per cent ad valorem. If it sold for $100 the tarfff will be but 1 per cent ad valorem. Therefore, in the Payne law, and in the Dingley law, articles on which it was impossible to determine the value in advance carried a specific rate, and in addition thereto an ad valorem rate, in order to catch their value.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman's own argument show that the specific duty is the most unscientific of all the tariff duties?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman could not make me believe that if he were to argue until he is black in the face.

Mr. HARDY. It seems apparent to me.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is not, and I have just given the gentleman an illustration about horses. What does he say to that? The imported horses should have paid $27.50 instead of $2.50.

Mr. HARDY. I say the gentleman's illustration shows that the law was badly enforced, if enforced at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. The ad valorem rates leave the way for the rogue to impose upon us and undervalue his imports. We do not fix the value; the foreigner puts the value upon the imported article.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman think that in this Government we could not have experts to fix the values?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes. We try to do that, but somehow they get by.

Mr. HARDY. There are rascals under all laws.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but you have opened the door and invited rascality by adopting an ad valorem instead of the specific rate.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman admits that under the specific law there are all sorts of rascalities in classifications that are perpetrated.

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, there have been rascals abroad in the land ever since our Savior was on earth and before; but under the specific rates of duty there was no object in undervaluing, because the amount of tax was fixed upon the article, no matter what its value. It had to pay a specific tax. Now, when you put the sliding scale of an ad valorem tax on the article, it gives a cunning, shrewd, dishonest importer the opportunity of undervaluing, and in many cases makes it very difficult for our experts to determine the value. Consequently we have such cases in court practically all of the time.

Mr. HARDY. Just one more question. There are various classifications of the specific duties, are there not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; but there is the specific rate fixed.

Mr. HARDY. The specific rate is different for different classes of goods.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. You do not impose a rate just by the pound.

Mr. FORDNEY. And that is quite likely based on the real value.

Mr. HARDY. The classification attempts to differentiate the value.

Mr. FORDNEY. For instance, the duty on hay under the Payne law was $4 a ton, no matter what its value.

Mr. HARDY. That is one of the commonest articles that you could think of, but on china did you have a specific rate?

Mr. FORDNEY. A specific and an ad valorem, because in chinaware there is no way of determining in advance what its value is or will be.

Mr. HARDY. Then the gentleman's system is a hodge-podge attempt to get the benefit of the ad valorem.

Mr. FORDNEY. Attempting to get the real duty that the article should pay, by having both in an article where you can not determine in advance what its value is. For instance, we have a specific rate of duty on sugar, based upon its purity, and the per cent of purity is a very easy thing to determine. There were great frauds perpetrated on imported sugar, and I will tell the gentleman how it was done. We put some men in State prison for perpetrating those frauds. It was discovered that importers of sugar at New York had connived with check weighmen and Government weighmen to perpetrate a fraud upon the Government.

Whether they fooled the Government weighman or connived with him, I do not know, but a scale was put in front of the desk whereby a truck coming off the vessel loaded with sugar was weighed. The importer and the purchaser of the sugar both checked up the weights. It was discovered that the check-weighman in leaning forward over his desk to get the weight pressed a corset steel which was ingeniously inserted in the desk so that when he leaned against the desk that scale showed 12½ per cent less than the actual weight. Therefore, the Government was beaten out of one-eighth of the total revenues due. One great sugar company over in New York paid, if my memory now serves me, $4,200,000 to settle with the Government and keep out of jail and some of their employees went to State prison. Another importing firm paid $700,000, another $180,000, and some suits are pending still, I believe.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to dwell much longer upon this tariff question, because it is not a question in this law. I am criticizing my colleagues for not raising some money on imports. I had intended to make but few remarks about it and then to pass on, but since my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] devoted more than 40 minutes to the tariff, I desired to answer him.

Here are the remarks of the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, one of the best souls on earth; the only thing wrong with him is he is a free trader.

I am in favor of letting woolens come in free, and, what is a good deal more, I am in favor of letting everything else come in free. That is my creed. I propose to support every amendment to this bill—

The Wilson bill; this is a long ways back, but he has maintained that reputation down to date—that puts anything on the free list. You can not have too much of a good thing. I am a free trader from the sole of my foot to the crown of my head.

That comes pretty near taking in the whole anatomy.

That is the doctrine of nature and of common sense.

Speech of Mr. CLARK on the Wilson bill, January, 1894, found on page 833 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fifty-third Congress. Further he said:

I do not propose for any protectionist to define the principles of free trade. I am a free trader and I glory in the fact. I rejoice in the record that we free traders made in the House in 1894, the Fifty-third Congress. Nearly all that was good in the Wilson bill originally was put there by the free traders.

Speech by Mr. CLARK, March 25, 1897, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session, Fifty-fifth Congress, page 269.

During the consideration of the Dingley bill Mr. Linney, Republican from North Carolina, said:

Is there a Member of the House who would have these duties stricken out? The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who cuts a splendid figure here, would, I undertake to say, like to have them put on the free list, because he would if he could with the arm of a giant tear down every customhouse in these United States, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Just exactly so.

That is the speech made in the Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, page 541.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, after nine days of sore travail at least one truth has been brought forth on the Republican side of this House and that by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Linney] when he said that I would destroy every customhouse in America, which is entirely correct. If I had my way, sir, I would tear them all down from turret to foundation stone.

Well, there is more just like these statements, but that is enough to show that he is a free trader. Now, my friends, let me say, does anyone believe that under free trade we could have built up our great manufacturing industries to maintain our high standard of life and living in this country and be prepared now as we are in the great steel companies of this country to furnish arms and munitions? Could we have built up our great fire-arms institutions in the country under free trade——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In a moment. Could we have built up our explosives and our woolen mills, cotton mills, shoe factories, sugar factories, shipyards, railroad equipments, machine shops, and many others now munition plants? Does anybody believe that under free trade we would have had these industries today to supply us with war necessities? [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe no man will contend that under free trade we could have built up those great industries. My friends, I have gone back and examined the records and speeches in this House made before the Civil War, and I want to do my Democratic friends this justice: To say that the speeches made in those days were correct, they were logical, they were sensible when you consider their foundation.

When the great New England States were demanding a protective tariff that they might build up the woolen and other industries of this country, the Members of Congress from the South said, "No; we have the cheapest labor in the world—slave labor. We are not afraid of the competition of the whole world. Cotton with us is king. Great Britain wants our cotton. We do not raise sufficient food supplies in the South to feed our slave labor. We can under free trade sell our cotton to Great Britain and purchase from Great Britain manufactured products under free trade cheaper than we can ever hope to purchase from New England under a protective tariff law. Therefore, we want the people of the North, instead of becoming a great manufacturing people, to raise more food supplies for our slaves so that we can raise more cotton to send abroad." That was logical, that was correct. But, my good friends, conditions have changed. You do not have that cheap labor any more, and we must adapt ourselves to the new conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman please explain whether or not it is possible and whether or not it would be profitable for us to raise our own sugar in the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I thank the gentleman for that question. We are producing in the United States 25 per cent of our present consumption of sugar. The sugar industry has been built up under a protective-tariff law. Although the duty is small now, my friends, sugar 96 per cent pure from Cuba pays 1 cent per pound import duty. Cuba has an advantage over all other duty-paying sugars of the world by our treaty with Cuba. The sugars from other countries pay 1¼ cents per pound, and we are producing, as I have said, 25 per cent of our consumption. We are importing from our insular possessions—Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands—about 25 per cent of our consumption. We are importing very largely from Cuba the remainder of the one-half of our consumption, about 5 per cent of our import coming from other duty-paying countries.

What condition would we be in for sugar to-day in this great war if we were in the situation that Germany is? Our ships driven from the seas, we could not import from our insular possessions or from any other country in the world. Therefore our people would be confined to but 25 per cent of their needs in sugar, which is a very great food supply. My good friends, we can not produce sugar in this country as cheaply as can the people of Cuba and in the southern countries. We must plant our crop every year, whereas in Cuba and in South and Central America and in the West Indian islands as many as 14 or 15 rotation crops are produced from one planting alone.

Cuba can produce 96° sugar in normal times for 1½ cents per pound. We have the land, we have the money, we have the desire to produce all the sugar in the United States our people consume. We send abroad annually more than $100,000,000 with which to buy sugar which we should produce at home. Germany has made herself strong in this war because of her ability to produce at home the things that she must have, and sugar is one of them. Prior to the war Great Britain imported from Germany and from France the major portion of the sugar which she consumed. She imported some from her colonies. Since the war with Germany Great Britain has been compelled to come to us for sugar; or, in other words, to Cuba.

But she does not have the capacity with which to refine the sugar that she imports, and what few refineries she had she has converted into munition factories, and we are importing from Cuba raw sugar, refining it, and sending it to Great Britain. Yet Great Britain, a free-trade country, to-day imposes an import tax of 6¼ cents per pound on refined sugar and we 1 cent a pound. We need money. We are engaged in war. Why not raise a little money on imports?

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion about the supply of sugar we would have had during this war if the policy of the House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress, which was for absolute free trade, had been carried out?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, in reply let me say that in the Underwood law there was a provision——

Mr. SLOAN. That was the Sixty-third Congress. But the Sixty-second House of Representatives was a Democratic House of Representatives and stood for absolute free sugar.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman may be correct. But in the Underwood law there was a section which provided that on the 1st of May of 1916 sugar should be admitted free. And during the time from the passage of the Underwood law, in October, 1913, down to March, 1916, when our friends the Democrats saw they needed the revenue and repealed that provision in the law, 40 per cent of the industries in the State of Louisiana engaged in the manufacture and production of sugar went out of existence, and their production of sugar dropped back from something like 425,000 tons to 225,000 tons annually. I am not far from correct in those figures. Possibly my good friend from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] has them correctly. But I am not far from being correct in these figures.

Now, our Democratic friends, seeing they needed the revenue, the President recommended the repeal of that provision of the law, and sugar has remained at the rate fixed—1 cent per pound on Cuban sugar and 1¼ cents on other imported duty-paying sugars.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Does not the gentleman think that we should differentiate between nonessential and essential imports and put a heavy tariff on nonessentials? For instance, I have read—and I do not know whether it is fiction or not—where one firm in Paris has contracted with two American firms to sell them over $3,000,000 worth of millinery during the next year. I think a heavy tariff should be put on those nonessentials.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. I am for about everything a lady wants to make her happy and handsome, and if it interferes with the comforts of our good women I would not put an overly heavy tax on milinery. It is a thing we must have—ladies clothing. France is noted for her ability in fashioning millinery and dresses over any other country in the world. But, my friends, in this law we have provided for a tax on those kinds of articles—luxuries so called. We have provided that nonessentials, as you might call them—silks and satins, and such like—costing above a certain sum shall pay a 10 per cent tax on the price paid above that fixed price. For instance, on a suit of clothing for a man at a price above $40 and a lady's hat above $15 the tax is 10 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Ten per cent above $50.

Mr. FORDNEY. Ten per cent above $50, good and well—say $50.

Mr. BAER. I was speaking with reference to the tariff.

Mr. FORDNEY. We have not put a tax on coffee and tea and raw rubber and such other things as we do not produce in this country but must use. The Republican principle has been to admit those things free of duty, because we must have them and do not produce them. It has been our Republican principle to tax the article that comes in competition with our products.

Now, we could, by putting 10 cents a pound tax upon coffee, have raised $130,000,000 this year. Our consumption of coffee is 1,300,000,000 pounds yearly. We consume at the same time 100,000,000 pounds of tea—1 pound of tea to every 13 pounds of coffee. Ten cents a pound on tea would yield $10,000,000, and on tea and coffee the total would be $140,000,000. But I am not in favor of putting an import duty on essentials, things which we must have but do not produce, and let other competitive articles go scot free.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My recollection is that for five years last past there have been no sugar plants constructed in the United States of any consequence.

Mr. FORDNEY. There have been no sugar plants of any consequence, my friend, constructed in the United States since we passed Cuban reciprocity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was going to ask what is the difference in the duty now and the duty on sugar when these mills were in operation all over the country.

Mr. FORDNEY. The duty is lower now than under the Payne law or the Dingley law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Were they constructed under a higher duty on sugar?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir. They were practically all constructed under a Republican tariff law. We have, in round numbers, I believe, 82 factories in the whole United States. Four hundred of such factories would produce all the sugar we consume annually, and we have plenty of land and plenty of people and plenty of money to establish those 400 sugar factories if capital would be assured that sugar would not be placed on the free list and the value of their property thereby destroyed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would a person be warranted in constructing a sugar plant now as they did then?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, absolutely no, because I believe our Democratic friends, if they are in power when the war is over and do not need the revenue so badly as now, will put sugar on the free list. They believe that the people of the United States are benefited by lowering the value of that article to the consumer and going abroad for it. I believe in producing at home those things that we can produce here and furnish employment to our labor and keep our money at home.

Mr. QUIN. How does the gentleman explain the repeal of the free-sugar clause in the Underwood bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. How is that? I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. QUIN. According to the statement that you made, how do you explain the repeal of the free-sugar clause in the Underwood tariff bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. We repealed it at the request of the President of the United States. Both Democrats and Republicans voted to repeal the law in that respect.

Mr. QUIN. Every man on this floor except 13?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think so. But your party takes orders from the White House while we follow the principles of good legislation. [Laughter.]

Mr. QUIN. Is that the reason? [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the reason. My good friend will pardon me. I did not intend to be sarcastic. You needed the revenue and we helped you to get it. That gave you $50,000,000 of revenue that you would have lost if you had put sugar on the free list.

Mr. QUIN. I did not want to interrupt the gentleman, but I did it on this account, that you said they would repeal it when this war was over. Was not one of the reasons why that was done to increase the sugar business in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. Bless you, no. Your President spoke from the platform there, the Speaker's desk, and said you, the Democrats, needed the revenue.

Mr. QUIN. Did not the scarcity of sugar throughout the country have something to do with it?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. It was the scarcity of revenue in the Treasury that prompted him to make the statement. It was not the scarcity of sugar. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They needed money, not sugar?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; money. The Treasury then was empty. Now, I am going to conclude my political argument here. I have dwelt too long on it and said too much, perhaps; but I was really forced to make this statement. The other day on the floor of the House a man for whom I have a high regard, Mr. FERRIS, of Oklahoma, made a partisan speech, and he made a very unjust reflection on the Republican Members of this House. I am going to appeal to him to strike those remarks from the RECORD. I looked for several days for his speech, and he did not print it. I hope he does not print it.

Mr. BAER. It is printed.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Oklahoma a few days ago, in making a political speech to the House, went out of his way to make a statement as to the good faith and loyalty to the Government of the Republican Members of this House. He stated that the Republican Members supported the Government from fear—not just in those words, but that was the substance of his statement. He intimated and illustrated his meaning by telling a story to the effect that their loyalty in supporting administration matters was due to fear, and not because we were actually loyal; that we voted to support the administration for fear we would "get hell"—his exact words—if we did not do it, and he told an old, threadbare, worn-out story to illustrate his statement.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. When the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] was interrupted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] with reference to that, I think it was cleared up. The gentleman said, "The gentleman is turning a pleasantry into a serious matter." I am reading now from Mr. FERRIS's speech, which was printed on the 5th of September.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am glad that he modified his statement somewhat, because it must have preyed upon his conscience. My good friend from Oklahoma made an absolute misstatement of facts when he said that the Republicans of this House are supporting war measures because of fear and trembling. The Republican Members of this House have as loyally supported the requests of the administration as have the Democrats, and I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the difference between the loyal support of Republicans to the Government during this war and the lack of loyalty on the part of the Democrats of this House during the Spanish-American War.

The gentleman from Oklahoma quoted from the remarks of ex-President Harrison and ex-President Roosevelt to show that during the Spanish-American War these gentlemen were asking that all the people be loyal to the administration. But the gentleman from Oklahoma failed to state all the facts, and a truth half told is worse than a fib. If the gentleman will go to the RECORD he will find that when the bond issue in 1898 was presented to the House of Representatives providing for $600,000,000 to finance the Government during the time of the Spanish-American War, out of the total membership of the Democrats in the House at that time but six Democrats supported that measure. The names of those gentlemen are Mr. Cummings, Mr. Griggs, and Mr. McClellan, of New York; Mr. Fitzgibbons, of Mississippi; Mr. McAleer, of Pennsylvania; and Gen. Joe Wheeler, of Alabama. [Applause.] Not one Republican has in this war voted against any bond issue.

The statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma, that the Republicans were supporting the administration for fear they would be damned if they did not, brought applause from the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me finish this sentence, and then I will. Gentlemen, you should erase from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the statement made by the gentleman from Oklahoma and the Democratic applause, if you wish to be honest. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, even the Kaiser knows that the Republicans are loyal, and we will give him to understand it more clearly from now on. [Applause.] I am as greatly interested in winning this war as any Democrat that ever breathed. My loyalty to the administration is not prompted by fear or criticism. I know the only way to win this war is by both Democrats and Republicans standing shoulder to shoulder in supporting our Government and our Army on the battle fields of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Of course we all agree with the gentleman on that. I do not know what prompted the gentleman from Oklahoma to make that statement, but it appears from the returns that the Democrats as well as the Republicans who failed to support these war measures in both branches of Congress have got "hell" back home when the people voted. The record so shows.

Mr. FORDNEY. I regret that any man should get "hell" on this earth, whatever he deserves hereafter. But the President of the United States said from this desk a few months ago that during the continuance of the war "politics was adjourned." You remember. So far as the Members of this House are concerned, he is correct; but he alone of all men in the land has shown partisan politics by his activities in the campaigns that have taken place throughout the country since the time he made that speech. He has tried to force upon the good people of the State of Michigan a candidate for the United States Senate on the Republican ticket who is now running on the Democratic ticket. [Laughter.] The people of that State have answered at the primaries, and will again answer at the polls in November, in my opinion [applause], and will send to the United States Senate an out-and-out Republican, because the people of the State who are Republicans are in a majority, and they decline to take dictation from an outsider, especially a Democrat.

Now, my good friends, another thing. Here is a little pamphlet that I received. I have received several such. It is An Unofficial Interpretation of the War Aims of the United States, Part II, by Burt Etheridge Barlow. It is very interesting. It goes on to show how many people there are in South America and in the colonies of Great Britain and France, where, if we are properly active, we may obtain some trade for our products. Then it winds up with an absolute free-trade argument on the tariff question. The major portion of the book is devoted to free trade. I wondered where in the name of common sense Burt Etheridge Barlow came from. I turned to the front of the book, and I found a slip pasted in it showing that it is sent out by George Creel. Who is George Creel?

Mr. KNUTSON. Who is paying for it?

Mr. FORDNEY. George Creel is employed by the President, and he is using a $100,000,000 fund set aside for the President to use for any purpose he chooses, taken out of the taxpayers of this country, to send broadcast free-trade arguments to the people before the next campaign comes on.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me conclude in a minute. I do not know who is responsible for that publication and many others of its kind, but I want to criticize. The people are called upon to contribute money to the point of complaining, and yet it is spent for that kind of literature—political claptrap, paid for out of the Treasury of the United States. One gentleman stated only a few weeks ago on the floor of this House that this Publicity Bureau had used $5,000,000 worth of print paper, while at the same time the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was not being sent out by the Government because of the scarcity of print paper, or at least only a few copies were being sent out. For several weeks the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was discontinued for the want of print paper, but no limit to the amount of print paper or to the amount of money to pay for printing and sending out such political stuff as this.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is not the only document of a political nature issued by the Creel Bureau.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no. Many such have been sent out by this same publicity bureau.

Mr. KNUTSON. They are all of a campaign nature.

Mr. SLOAN. That individual named Creel, is he the same Mr. Creel who before a very intelligent audience rendered devout thanks that this country was not prepared for war when we entered it, a condition which we know has continued, especially so far as rifles, heavy ordnance, and aeroplanes were concerned, up until recently? Is that the same Mr. Creel?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know him and do not have very much love for him or any other man who spends our money now for such political stuff when we need the money so badly to carry on this dreadful war. [Applause.]

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BAER. I think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] will not want to put the statement in the RECORD that all this literature that was sent out was of a political nature, because I have sent out a good deal of war literature that I am sure is not a Democrtaic campaign document.

Mr. FORDNEY. You do not send out free-trade arguments like that, do you?

Mr. BAER. No.

Mr. KNUTSON. I want to say to the gentleman from North Dakota that the Creel Bureau issued a booklet last summer in the Red, White, and Blue series that was Democratic doctrine from cover to cover, and the gentleman can not deny it.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. I do not know Mr. Creel. He appeared before our committee once, but I think you are doing the man a great injustice. That was not partisan matter. It was to teach the people of the United States the real causes of this war. A better thing could not have been done by the Government, I do not care who denies it. That stuff that Mr. Creel sent out was worth more to the people of America than all the rest of the newspapers and magazines combined for the time being.

Mr. KNUTSON. You mean more to the Democrats of America.

Mr. QUIN. No; I mean to the people. I know the people down in my country did not understand the war——

Mr. KNUTSON. Probably some of them do not understand it yet.

Mr. QUIN. I think that criticism of Mr. Creel is unjust.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman can show me that this is good information for the public, except that it is democratic doctrine, purely democratic, then I will show the gentleman white blackbirds.

Mr. QUIN. I do not vouch for all of it, but I am talking about the major portion and the intent and purpose of it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. He shows how many people there are down south of us to whom we can sell goods. Well, that is uninteresting to me and to the average layman at the present time. And, so far as the manufacturers are concerned, they know that already. The census reports show that. You can get it anywhere on library shelves; but in this book here he goes back and uses the argument that a protective tariff is unsound, because in the early days our people decided that an export duty from one State to another was unconstitutional. That is his argument.

Let me go on. So much for Mr. Creel. My good friend KITCHIN spoke of the importation of hides. Hides were put upon the free list in the Payne tariff law in 1909, and they were continued on the free list in the Underwood tariff law. The price of hides has gone up, but the importations have not increased lately. Only heavy hides, such as weighed more than 60 pounds, were put upon the free list in the Payne tariff law.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. If you are going to read that stuff which you have in your hand, the pamphlet referred to, I will not yield. I will yield to the gentleman. I want to be courteous.

Mr. GANDY. I just wanted to know if the gentleman meant to leave the inference by the statement he made that the publication he referred to, which I have in my hand, was a Government document?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think so.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman look at it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think it was sent out by George Creel. There is a slip pasted on the first page headed, Committee on Public Information, George Creel, chairman; and I think undoubtedly George Creel induced Burt Etheridge Barlow to write the article.

Mr. GANDY. If the gentleman will look at that statement he will find that it is simply a statement by Mr. Creel that that publication has passed the military censor. It is not a Government publication and does not purport to be a Government document, and it is not sent out by the Committee on Public Information.

Mr. FORDNEY. You can not make me believe that George Creel can send that out broadcast without it costing the Government some money.

Mr. GANDY. That does not say that George Creel sends it out.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to criticize Mr. Creel unjustly, but I know that when he was asked a certain question about Members of the House of Representatives he replied, "Oh, I do not want to go slumming." That is George Creel. I decline to allow Congress to be called a place for slumming; and that statement ought to have raised the indignation of Congress to the point where Mr. George Creel's head would have gone off. He should be kicked out of the position he holds. He has no justification for saying that Members of Congress are slums. He did say it and half apologized for it, but I would not accept his apology.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say, in response to what the gentleman from South Dakota said, that this is not a public document; that it was sent out under a frank; and if it was not a public document and was sent out under a frank by a Government official it is a violation of the law.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know the details, but I do know that if it was sent out by Government money some of that money was your money and some was my money and the money of the taxpayers, not raised by taxes or bond issue for such purpose.

I want to call one matter to the attention of my good friend Mr. KITCHIN. He is well informed on this bill. He has given great attention to it, and I have no criticism of him. He and I differed about things that went into the bill, and no member of the committee is pleased with everything in the bill. But there is one particular feature that I want to call his attention to that I had not thought of when we were in committee. Last week it occurred to me that it affected very materially the cotton mills of the South, and I am as much interested in their welfare as is the gentleman from North Carolina or any other man.

Under existing law the normal income tax paid by these corporations is 6 per cent. In this bill the normal tax of the corporations has been increased to 18 per cent. But the bill provides that the earnings of the corporation made during this calendar year and distributed to the stockholders shall pay but 12 per cent. In other words, money earned by the corporation this year and retained in the business by the corporation, not paid out to the stockholders, must pay an extra penalty of 6 per cent. That is the substance of the law.

On that my good friend from North Carolina and I differed. I used this argument. In the first place let me say that the purpose of a majority of the members of the committee was to compel corporations to pay out all their earnings of this taxable year so that the Government can tax that money in the hands of the individual. That is the purpose. Under existing law the earnings of the taxable year retained in the business or used in the business paid no penalty but the normal tax, and nothing more. What is held by the corporation not distributed, for the purpose of defrauding the Government, pays a penalty of 15 per cent. There were no penalties collected, because, I suppose, all the money retained by the corporation was used in the business.

I have contended that the corporations must retain in their business a certain portion of their earnings in order to have money to do business with. First, let me give a comparison by the banks. Banks organize, and each year from their profits they distribute a certain portion of their profits to their stockholders and place the balance to surplus or undivided profits and build up their capital in that way.

Take a bank with $100,000 capital that has built up $100,000 surplus and, say, $25,000 undivided profits. If it places any of the earnings of this year to undivided profits, if this bill becomes a law, as it is now written, that bank must pay 18 per cent on that money placed to undivided profits. The bank will not do it with that extra penalty of 6 per cent imposed; they must pay 12 per cent normal tax anyway.

It is true that every bank in the land has some bad accounts. If that penalty compels them to distribute all of the earnings to their stockholders, when the bank examiner comes along and directs the bank to charge off on their books certain notes or bonds which are declared worthless, they must have something to charge such bad accounts to or they will have to break into the surplus or capital of the bank. A national bank under the law can loan 10 per cent of its capital and surplus to any individual or firm; no more. There is no limit to commercial paper that can be discounted for one customer.

Now, when they must charge off on their books bad notes and have exhausted their undivided profits, they must then break into their surplus and consequently disturb all their loans, where they have loaned up to the limit under the law, and they must call in their customers and make them reduce their accounts. It is a serious thing for the banking interests of the country, because as the population increases the wealth increases and the deposists in the banks increase, and in order to more properly and thoroughly secure the depositors they must build up a surplus or they will not have adequate security to depositors.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Take a manufacturing institution, a corporation that has $100,000 capital with which it made last year, say, $30,000. It pays a regular dividend of 8 per cent and so would have $22,000 left. Suppose it owes $50,000 and is called upon to pay the debt. If it pays $22,000 on that debt, if I understand the gentleman, then it must pay the 18 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the committee so amended the bill that the interest-bearing obligations of a corporation can be paid out of the earnings without the payment of the extra 6 per cent penalty.

Now, I started to call my good friend's attention to the cotton mills of the South. Yesterday I received this telegram from a dear friend of mine, the proprietor of a cotton mill, to whom I wrote a week ago asking him to inform me how much money is required in his business in that cotton factory now to carry on and do the same volume of business as compared to the amount that was required during normal times.

First, let me say that there are 33,430,000 spindles in the cotton mills of the United States on August 1, 1917, and what applies to this cotton mill applies to all cotton mills in the United States. More than one-half of the spindles in the United States in cotton mills are south of Mason and Dixon's line. That industry is growing in the South like mushrooms in the night. Here is the reply that I received from the owner of this cotton mill:

LAUREL, MISS., September 6, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Our 22,000-spindle plant here weaves medium-weight brown staple cloth. It costs between five and six hundred thousand dollars. To replace now would require more than $850,000. Formerly we needed for working capital for various items about as follows: For cotton in the machinery, supplies, and unsold cloth about twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars; now it takes for these purposes sixty to eighty thousand dollars. Formerly it required for cotton in the warehouse sixty to seventy-five thousand dollars; now it takes two hundred to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. At times this year, as we usually contract, we will have three to four hundred thousand dollars in cotton alone. Formerly it took seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars to carry customers' accounts; now the lowest is $175,000, and from that up to $250,000. Formerly ten to fifteen thousand dollars in bank was sufficient; now, on account of high prices and wide market fluctuations, forty to fifty thousand in bank is little enough to be safe. In other words, where one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars' working capital was all right, it now requires five hundred to six hundred thousand dollars to handle exactly the same volume of production. Hope this is plain. If not, wire quick and will try to give further information.

WALLACE B. ROGERS.

That telegram came Friday, and I have here a letter which is dated September 6, which I will read in part:

SEPTEMBER 6, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FORDNEY: I must apologize for not realizing that you wanted the information immediately, as asked for in your letter of August 24. The papers seemed to talk as though the revenue bill was not going to be finished before the 1st of November, and this had sort of put me to sleep. I had hoped that one of us would be up there in the next week or 10 days when we could talk to you more fully. Hope the telegram sent will answer the purpose. I inclose a copy. It really contains about all the information to give and is accurate.

It will be a crime if dividends are forced to be paid, as it will weaken the company so that they will not be able to survive competition after the war. Later on there will be a sad price to pay if the action is taken as contemplated. This is a day above all others when every dollar possible ought to be put back in the plant, not for enlargement but for strengthening in every way possible for after-the-war conditions.

My kindest regards and best wishes for your continued success. I know you have a hard job, but we were all glad to know you had been returned as usual.

Very truly, yours,

WALLACE B. ROGERS.

The amount of money needed, as shown, is $25, for every spindle in the plant, dividing his minimum and maximum of accounts.

Mr. GOOD. That is, working capital?

Mr. FORDNEY. Working capital; yes, sir. It figures out, on 33,430,000 spindles at $25 each, $835,750,000. Six per cent is the penalty for keeping this money in the business with which to do business, or $50,145,000 penalty is imposed upon the cotton mills of the United States by that 6 per cent penalty. It is an exceedingly serious situation. I speak now only of the cotton mills; but let me go further. I am engaged in the lumber business and I know more about my own business than another business. It is a wise man who pays attention to his own business. He has the least competition of any man. In normal times selling a given quantity of lumber requires a certain amount of money to manufacture and market the same, and the firm has at least one or two months' sales standing upon its books all the time.

Let me give you an illustration: Suppose you were manufacturing three and one-half million feet of lumber per month, which brought before the war in normal times, say, $15 per thousand at the mill—$52,500 per month would be the average sales. It required of cash in the bank, accounts on your books, and stock in the yard more than $100,000 all of the time to do business in normal times in that proportion. To-day the price of lumber is practically double the price in normal times, and you must have double the amount of money in the business to carry on business of the year that you had in normal times, and to compel a corporation to put out all of its earnings of this year and keep none at all to do business with puts the concern in a most embarrassing position. They must borrow money to do this extra business, with inflated prices and the higher cost of raw material and the higher cost of labor, if they pay out their dividends to their stockholders. I say that 6 per cent penalty is the most serious proposition of the bill, if it becomes a law as now written, and I want you to think that feature of this bill over very carefully. I think that provision ought to be stricken out; but when I am in Rome I am going to do as the Romans do. I helped to frame this bill in committee.

I did not get everything in that I wanted, but I am not going to offer an amendment. It is my duty to stand by this bill and pass it. It is the best that we could get. The majority rules, and I agreed to abide by the majority, and I am going to do so, but it ought to be amended.

There is one feature in the bill that I like. I have taken the position, and so did other members of the committee, that a soldier in the war fighting for you and for me should not be taxed upon his measly income from the Government, and we have inserted a provision that exempts him up to $3,500 if he is in France or if he is on the sea. [Applause.] I wanted to go further, but other gentlemen did not.

I do not believe the definition of capital as found in the bill is correct. I have so contended all the way through from the beginning and took that position last year in the framing of the existing law, but I was voted down. I think this law ought to be amended in that respect, and will tell you why.

This law provides that for the purpose of deductions you can only deduct your 8 or 10 per cent upon the actual capital originally invested—capital, surplus, and undivided profits. People who engaged in business 20 or 30 years ago and have built up a great institution ought to have the benefit of the advanced values of their property, down to a certain time at least. Let me tell you what is done under existing law. In existing law a man engaged in the lumber business—and I speak of the lumber business because I am more familiar with it—in manufacturing is permitted to charge up to cost of production the value of timber as of March 1, 1913, which is the time the income-tax law was held constitutional by the courts, and whatever earnings that timber has made from that time down to the present time is to be considered as income of the year that he converts it into finished product.

But its increased value from the time he purchased it—maybe 40 years ago down to March 1, 1913—can be used as a part of his cost of production. He can not do that in his deduction. He can in the cost of production. I call attention to this. In the manufacture of lumber in the States of Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, on the Pacific Coast, or in the South value of timber in the woods, in the tree—let us take the value. Say the average value of the stumpage March 1, 1913, was $5 per thousand. When the manufacturers convert the timber into lumber they can charge to the cost of production $5 stumpage, and then labor and all other costs, and the price received above that is profit, and on that profit they must pay a tax. That is correct, that is honest, that is justifiable; but when you come to take your deduction before paying the excess-profits tax or war-profits tax, as the case may be, no, no, you do not get the value as of March 1, 1913. The capital invested 40 years ago and from that take your deduction of 8 per cent. That is not right. If it is capital in your cost of production, it ought to be capital all the time and ought to be capital in your deduction.

Therefore, the definition of capital is wrong. I give this illustration; I have given it before. I said to my good friend, Mr. KITCHIN, suppose 20 years ago you and I purchased a property down in North Carolina and organized the Kitchin Lumber Co. You own half and I own half. We put in originally $100,000 each, and from that time down to the present day we have taken out no money except what we must have for ourselves and families to live on. We have built up a great industry. Along comes Bill Jones and says, "Gentlemen, I will give a million dollars for your property." Mr. KITCHIN sells his interest, one-half, to Bill Jones. And he takes half a million dollars and walks out. For any reason whatever I say, "No; I do not care to sell my interest." My capital is $100,000 and Bill Jones's a half million. Is that right? Why is not my capital the same as that of Jones? I could have sold and taken half a million but I did not. I kept my property. I convert it into money and get more than half a million dollars, and I pay taxes on more than half a million when I convert it into money. I say, gentlemen, the definition of capital, as now in the bill, is wrong.

Now, another thing in the law is wrong. Borrowed capital ought to be capital. Let me give an illustration. Suppose that a body of rich men organize a company with a capital of $1,000,000 and put in the cash and take their stock for it and go on and do business. You and I organize a company in the same business with a capital of $1,000,000. We are poor. We can only put in a half million dollars. We step out and borrow a half million dollars. We put that half million dollars of borrowed money in the business and it is capital in the business. We pay more taxes than the firm that had the cash to put up and borrowed no money. That is not right. We do under the terms of the bill permit them to deduct the interest paid upon the borrowed capital, but that is not sufficient relief. They ought to be permitted to use as capital capital paid out of their pockets or borrowed capital. It is capital in the business, and we ought to let them use it in their deduction. In every instance the firm that borrows money pays more taxes than does the firm that has the money to put in and borrows none. That seems to me decidedly unjust. All laws are based upon justice, gentlemen. When a child at my father's knee he told me that the laws of the land were based upon God's law, the Bible, just and equitable to everybody, and the law that is not so framed, just and equitable to all, is, I have said, not good law. I believe these provisions of this bill should be changed.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Under the law as it is now framed, would it not be an inducement to corporations to increase their capital stock? I have in mind two corporations, one with $100,000 and another with $200,000 in the same business, and yet the $200,000 capital corporation may only do one-tenth more business than the corporation having $100,000 capital stock. I believe under the present law the tax will not be equalized and will have a tendency for corporations to increase their capital stock in order to get the higher deduction.

Mr. FORDNEY. In order to get the deduction; yes, sir. The more capital you have in your business the less taxes you are going to pay. Let me give you an illustration. It was stated the American Tobacco Co. has a capital of $157,000,000 and paid $80,000 taxes last year because of watered stock, inflated capital, goodwill, camel-back cigarettes, signs, and labels, and so forth, put in at a value—inflated capital. Why, my good friends, on the $157,000,000 they do not make enough money to bring them up to where they must pay the excess-profits or war-profits tax. The larger the capital the better off you are.

Now, there is a firm over at Cleveland, Ohio, situated under peculiar conditions. The father died and left the property to his estate, but provided that for so many years the stock of that company should not be increased. On $25,000 capital they made $1,125,000 profits last year. That is war profit. I will tell you what this bill will do. Their deductions will be 10 per cent on their capital plus $3,000, or a total of $5,500. Fifty-five hundred dollars out of $1,125,000 leaves them, in round numbers, $1,120,000. And the very first whack we take 80 per cent of that $1,120,000 and then take 12 per cent of what is left. Now, if they had a million dollars or two or three million dollars capital they would get 10 per cent deduction on the capital.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentlemen yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose most of that profit is stock—that is, in material, supplies which are necessary for the company's business—how is the Government going to get the cash?

Mr. FORDNEY. This law does not give any relief if your business shows a profit in raw material or whatever it is. If it shows a profit during the year, you must distribute that to the stockholders or pay 18 per cent normal tax on it.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is a concern with $25,000 capital. Of course, I do not know how much reserve they have or how much wealth they may have; but presuming they have not got the money and they have their profits in inventory, what is going to become of the concern; is it going out of the business?

Mr. FORDNEY. Borrow money to pay their taxes.

Mr. MADDEN. How can they afford it?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no other relief that I can see. But, however, let me say to the House that we have provided in this law that if those profits are war profits, or if war profits exceed the sum of $50,000—on limited capital it should be considered war profits—up to $50,000 they are protected from these heavy taxes.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose a concern makes a good profit and has a large debt, and instead of distributing it to the stockholders it pays its debt?

Mr. FORDNEY. You are permitted to pay debts on interest-bearing obligations without that penalty. There is a provision in the law to that effect.

Now, gentlemen, unless there is some question that some one wishes to ask me I want to close. I am getting quite tired. I have talked rather loud in order that I might be heard clearly, and consequently I am quite tired.

I read you this little poem in the beginning to impress upon your minds the duty of every loyal, patriotic citizen. I do not like to mention this, but I can hardly refrain from it. When it comes to sending your own boy to the war, I tell you the heart-strings pull. I went out here, as I have stated, to the Walter Reed Hospital the other day, and there I saw dear, sweet-faced young men with their arms and hands and legs off. I saw one boy with his right leg and left arm off. There are hundreds of them there, who went over to fight the battles for this great Nation. I regret to say, and yet I am proud of the fact, that five of my beloved family are in this war. And it touches my heartstrings to think that my boy may lay down his life over there in this great cause; but if he dies, he dies for a great cause.

I hope God will send the boys back safe; and that meeting will be a most happy one, I assure you. Two of my sons, two grandsons, and a son-in-law are in this war, and three more come under this new draft law—one son and two sons-in-law. I am doing my share, and I am willing to give up my earnings, my wealth. And if it would only bring back to me those boys in their health and strength, how willingly would I give every nickel and start out once more with a woolen shirt and a pair of overalls to make my living at hard labor. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I thank you for your courtesy. I have talked more than I should, more than I expected, but I want to appeal to you, right or wrong, we are in this war and that we must win. We must win! Oh, what an awful thing it would be to lose the war, to lose our beloved sons, and see our homes destroyed as the people of France have seen theirs destroyed, and as have the people of Belgium, and of Serbia, and of Roumania, and of other parts of Europe.

Oh, what a sad sight it would be to witness all of that! What a sad thought it is that your boy and my boy may be buried in the wake of the army over there! He needs food; he needs clothes; he needs equipment with which to meet his well-equipped foe. I am sorry to say, gentlemen, but it is my honest conviction, that the only way we can win this war is to decrease the number of our enemy by putting them out of commission. [Applause.] Come forward and give to the Government your loyal support, your money, and give your life, if necessary, to defend your wives and your daughters, and your sweethearts!

A FATHER'S PRAYER.

[K. G. Duffield.]

I ain't been much on prayin', God,
Er goin' t' church,
I've tried t' do what I thought wuz right,
A-helpin' my friends an' treatin' 'em white.
I may be sharp on a business deal,
I haven't lied an' I wouldn't steal.
An' so I'm askin' you, God, to-night:
Watch over Bill when we start t' fight.

I know you've a lot uv work t' do
Way over there.
A-watchin' th' Hun at his hellish play,
An' countin' the souls ez they fly away.
Bill's only a boy, but he had t' go,
With mother an' me a-lovin' him so.
An' so we pray, dear God, to-night:
Watch over Bill when we start t' fight.

We're lonely, God, an' want our boy,
Across th' sea.
All we can do is wait an' pray;
It's hard t' bear with him away.
Oh, keep him clean an' brave an' true;
He's fightin' fer mother an' me an' You.
So hear me, God, ez I pray to-night:
Watch over Bill when we start t' fight.

We know it will end somehow, some day,
Ez all things do.
Th' dead will sleep in th' madman's track,
An' only th' strong come marchin' back.
We'll count it lost if th' fight is won,
Th' price uv success—our only son.
An' so I pray, dear God, to-night:
Watch over Bill when we start t' fight.

[Applause.]

I thank you, gentlemen. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On August 30, 1918:

S. 4527. An act to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occuring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

On August 31, 1918:

H. J. Res. 324. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government for the month of September, 1918, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11692. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes;

H. R. 12704. An act to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States, or of its allies; and

H. R. 12731. An act amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this side took two days, I think, and the other side has not taken over two hours and a half. So it has a whole lot to its credit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Shall I go on?

Mr. KITCHIN. Go right on.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is the heaviest tax bill ever essayed in the history of the world, and the chief honors attaching to it may readily be conceded to three distinguished gentlemen, none of them Republicans, but all of them striving to maintain the national credit by providing the ways and means to enable the Government to meet the obligations incurred for the purposes of the war.

The hardest working Member of the trio for this purpose was the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. KITCHIN] [applause], who, with the assistance of a few faithful experts, has labored industriously, morning, noon, and night, through the worst hot spell Washington has ever known, for a period of three months, to bring up to date the former war-revenue measures and to simplify and, if possible, make them understandable. His work in committee, his researches, and his investigations, limited and handicapped to some extent by varying opinions and suggestions emanating from other high sources in official life, resulted eventually in the present compilation of 190 printed pages (H. R. 12893) and justify the appropriateness of applying the short title, "The Kitchin bill," to this exceptional measure. [Applause.] This compliment is well earned, since no member of the committee, and probably no Member of the House, is so well equipped to explain the bill and make clear to the layman its many intricate provisions as is the gentleman from North Carolina.

Another distinguished official who had much to do with the preparation of the bill is the Secretary of the Treasury, who, apart from his many other arduous duties, found time toward the close of the committee's deliberations to personally appear before the committee with certain suggestions by way of amendment, to which the committee gave its respectful consideration. During his long western tour in the earlier stages of the proceedings, the Secretary was represented by his able assistant, Mr. Leffingwell, of New York, and by Dr. Adams, of the Treasury Tax Advisory Board, whose statements on behalf of the Secretary, being printed in the hearings, speak for themselves.

It was the Secretary of the Treasury who advised the committee in his letter to Mr. KITCHIN, June 5, 1918, that the Treasury would require approximately $24,000,000,000 to keep up with its authorized expenditures and its loans to the allies to June 30, 1919. Of this vast total, the Secretary said it would be necessary, in accordance with the President's recommendations to Congress, to raise at least $8,000,000,000 by taxation, leaving the tremendous balance of $16,000,000,000 to be raised by loans. The committee was obliged, in view of this authorized statement of the necessities of the Government, to conform as nearly as prudence would dictate to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury in order that there might be no adverse suggestions to Congress to endanger or delay the passage of the bill.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS TO CONGRESS.

More important, however, was the interest of the President of the United States in the preparation of this unprecedented measure. It was no less a person than the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy who came to the two Houses of Congress on May 27 last and started the legislative machinery, which, operating through the Ways and Means Committee, now permits the presentation of this great bill to the House. In the memorable address then made to Congress the President said:

The present tax laws are marred * * * by inequalities which ought to be remedied. Indisputable facts, every one, and we can not alter or blink them. To state them is argument enough.

And yet—

Continued the President—

perhaps you will permit me to dwell for a moment upon the situation they disclose. Enormous loans freely spent in the stimulation of industry of almost every source produce inflations and extravagances which presently make the whole economic structure questionable and insecure and the very basis of credit is cut away. Only fair, equitably distributed taxation, of the widest incidence and drawing chiefly from the sources which would be likely to demoralize credit by their abundance, can prevent inflation and keep our industrial system free of speculation and waste. We shall naturally turn, therefore, I suppose, to war profits and incomes and luxuries for the additional taxes. But the war profits and incomes upon which the increased taxes will be levied will be the profits and incomes of the calendar year 1918. It would be manifestly unfair to wait until the early months of 1919 to say what they are to be. It might be difficult, I should imagine, to run the mill with water that had already gone over the wheel.

Further on in his address the President, having reminded Congress that "we are at the peak and crisis" of the war, concerning which he said "there can be no pause or intermission," demanded that there should be "an unquestionable supply of money," and said:

That is the situation, and it is the situation which creates the duty; no choice or preference of ours. There is only one way to meet that duty. We must meet it without selfishness or fear of consequences. Politics is adjourned. The elections will go to those who think least of it; to those who go to the constituencies without explanations or excuses, with a plain record of duty faithfully and disinterestedly performed. I for one am always confident that the people of this country will give a just verdict upon the service of the men who act for them when the facts are such that no man can disguise or conceal them. There is no danger of deceit now. An intense and pitiless light beats upon every man and every action in this tragic plot of war that is now upon the stage. If lobbyists hurry to Washington to attempt to turn what you do in the matter of taxation to their protection or advantage, the light will beat also upon them. There is abundant fuel for the light in the records of the Treasury with regard to profits of every sort. The profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation. There is such profiteering now, and the information with regard to it is available and indisputable.

With this deliverance against the effectiveness of existing revenue laws and the suggestion that Congress should disregard "the lobbies of Washington hotels, where the atmosphere seems to make it possible to believe what is believed nowhere else," the President declared the readiness of the people of the country not only "to win the war," but "to bear any burden and undergo every sacrifice that it may be necessary for them to bear in order to win it."

We need not be afraid to tax them, if we lay taxes justly—

Said the President—

They know that the war must be paid for, and that it is they who must pay for it; and if the burden is justly distributed and the sacrifice made a common sacrifice from which none escapes who can bear it at all, they will carry it cheerfully and with a sort of solemn pride.

And then evincing the willingness of the people to bear their share of the expense and suffering of war, he asked, "Shall we grow weary when they bid us act?"

The President's hand in the preparation of the bill is, therefore, plainly evident. His is the great task of carrying this war to a successful conclusion, and to him must be given ungrudgingly, as he has asked, those ways and means essential to the accomplishmnt of the main purpose.

I submit these three names for special mention in connection with the Kitchin bill, because to them and to their Democratic colleagues in committee should go the lion's share of the credit, if credit it be, for this extraordinary revenue measure.

REPUBLICANS COOPERATED WITH MAJORITY.

The Republican minority was constantly in committee making suggestions and offering advice, and it was treated by the majority with rare courtesy and good will, but many of its recommendations were rejected and much of its advice unheeded. In general terms, the Republican minority stood for equitable and just taxes and urged that they be so adjusted as to permit business to continue, but at no time could it have taken the bill from the hands of the majority, even though it had been so disposed. It is substantially true, therefore, as indicated by the gentleman from North Carolina in his opening address, that party lines played little part in the discussion. With the bill in the hands of the majority and the administration, apart from disagreements it might have had with the majority, committed to an $8,000,000,000 bill, there was little else for the Republican minority to do but to help in good faith to bring in a bill as free from injustice and inequalities as could be obtained under existing conditions. It was not a case where the Republican minority could do what it would do under ordinary circumstances; there was no alternative except to filibuster and block the majority in the face of an urgent demand from the Commander in Chief for money to support our soldiers in France. Even this recourse, had the minority members entertained it for one moment—which, of course, they did not—would in the end have been futile. While, therefore, it was magnanimous of the gentleman from North Carolina to speak of the "unanimity" with which the committee reported the bill, he would do injustice to his own complete mastery of the situation if he had intimated that at any time on any of the vital issues in the bill they could have unhorsed him. The Republican minority did cooperate with the majority, offering such assistance as it could to tide over a national financial crisis. That much it did faithfully and from a sense of duty. That, however, would yield to the Republican Party so scant a part of the glory attaching to the Kitchin bill that I, for one, would be willing to relinquish most of it. To the gentleman from North Carolina, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the President of the United States, and to their financial experts and advisers we may graciously concede the principal honors for this extraordinary measure, since theirs, in the last analysis, must be the responsibility.

And here it may be noted that Republicans have been in the minority in the House since war broke out in Europe, August, 1914. They have been in the minority since the United States decided to participate in the war. Nevertheless they have steadfastly supported the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy from the beginning. As a minority, reserving all political rights and conscious of certain overt acts and letters which seem to warrant at least an armed neutrality, since "politics is adjourned," they have cheerfully, and with greater fervor than has been displayed at times by the President's partisan followers, supported every measure the purpose of which was to further our common interests in war and concerning which there could be no hidden or doubtful meaning. For Republican members of the committee, therefore, it is fair to say that while they have agreed to report this bill, that the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee might be unhampered in presenting it to the House and to the country, and while some of its provisions may be satisfactory and others wholly at variance with their personal and economic views, it is not a minority creation, and would not have come to the House in its present form if the responsibility of raising the enormous sum of $8,000,000,000 had rested upon a Republican administration.

SOME DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

With this brief "nonpartisan statement" [laughter], may I be pardoned for referring to some points of difference which tended to prolong the committee's deliberations? It may help to throw light upon some of the methods of taxation proposed in the bill which will necessarily provoke discussion. Long ago it was well said that "He that provideth not for his own household hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel." The modern taxgatherer may be persuaded, with due regard for the "home folks," that there is more truth than poetry in that bit of biblical wisdom. I do not now say that Democrats would be more susceptible, being in power, to take advantage of the course of action thus epitomized than would Republicans being in power. Either party might provide for his own household without unduly offending the other, but they might do it in different ways. Nor is it quite possible to forget another solemn injunction to those who have the power to levy burdens upon their fellow men: "To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." These are apt suggestions, susceptible of penetrating the analytical minds of those who have the power to enter the peoples' vineyard and apportion the fruits thereof. To tax or not to tax is a conundrum. When translated into this simple form, "to tax, but whom to tax," even the immortal Shakespeare might not answer satisfactorily to those who have to pay. Shall we tax those whom we love? Well may those who have the power to tax put to themselves this most absorbing question, for if we tax those whom we love and they turn upon us and smite us, even though the tax be just, will it be wise for us to levy the tax at all? Or, since we must tax, shall we put the tax heavily upon those whom we do not love and lightly upon those whom we do love? These, I say, are problems that sometimes rise in the inner councils of those who, having the power to tax, and who, exercising that power, may tax wisely but not too well. The human instincts, the sense of self-preservation, the squirrel-like habit of laying up stores for the impending winter, or before the squirrels hold their conventions [laughter] are attributes of parties as they are of men, and doubtless will be until the end.

Be that as it may, it is still of interest that the majority was not of one mind upon the very important and troublous questions of excess profits and war profits taxes. It developed during the weary three months about the council table that there were several kinds of Democrats with varying views as to cause and effect. There was an "eat-'em-alive" variety and a "go-slow" brand. There were those who would take all of the war profits and those who had grown conservative through the lapse of years, under the weight of increasing responsibility. It may be said that two distinct kinds of Democrats finally appeared upon the scene: The Administration or Treasury wing, whose radicalism was subsequently tempered by discussion and the passage of time, and Congress Democrats, who entertained the fogyish notion that under the Constitution they were the peoples' representatives. As to these two kinds of Democrats it may be no breach of committee confidence to say that as good Democrats in ominous struggles characterizing their preelection performances usually do, they finally united, revealing to the patient and patriotic Republican members of the committee an unexpected but highly refreshing legislative allegory entitled, "The Lion and the Lamb," at the conclusion of which it was left to the imagination to determine which had been the lion and which the lamb. The result of the compromise will be found on page 54 of the bill, where the plan of the radicals and the plan of the conservatives are quietly tucked away. If the compromise stands as written in the bill, it will be up to the Treasury Department to impose an excess profits tax regardless of prewar profits according to Mr. Kitchin's plan, or a war profits tax based upon prewar earnings after the English system, as insisted upon by the Secretary of the Treasury. "You pays your money and you takes your choice." In token of this compromise, I respectfully bring to bar the Treasury's principal tax expert, Dr. Adams, who, in an article written for the American Academy of Political and Social Science, January, 1918, pointed out some of the inequalities of the existing excess profits law, which inequalities were doubtless in the mind of the President when he made his address to Congress in May last. "This law," says Dr. Adams, "fairly bristles with legal and administrative difficulties"—an admission, as it were, that the business man who has wasted valuable days and nights in a vain endeavor to comply with existing law is not the only one who fails to thoroughly comprehend it.

The difficulty under discussion—is not to be remedied by any substitution of the war profits principle for the excess profits principle, of the English for the American method of computing the tax.

Here are two corporations, each with $1,000,000 capital and each earning $300,000 a year during the war, but whereas corporation X earned $200,000 in the normal or average year before the war, corporation Y earned only $80,000. Under the English law, with its prewar income standard, corporation Y would be taxed very much more heavily than corporation X, which is in reality the stronger corporation. Both corporations earn the same amount during the war, but the one which was more prosperous in the past, the one which had accumulated the larger revenues, the larger surplus against a rainy day, would, under the English law, pay the smaller tax. As a matter of principle, neglecting the practical difficulties of applying the capital standard, it is difficult to see any superiority in the English method of war profits taxation. Does prewar prosperity establish just ground for exemption or immunity during the war? Do not extra war profits added to a high level of prewar profits create an unusual capacity to bear taxes, rather than the reverse? If you and I are equally prosperous to-day, but I have been prosperous much longer than you, is my longer prosperity sufficient reason for levying a smaller tax upon me than you?

There, in brief, is one of the inequalities of existing law. The concern which suffered losses in the prewar years, or whose average profits were small, pays heavily on its profits of 1917 and 1918, while the great corporation, which simply continued in 1917 and 1918 or later to make substantially the same profits it made in the prewar period, escapes taxation altogether. It was contended in the hearings that this peculiar preference would operate in favor of certain of the larger corporations, the Henry Ford concern, for instance, because while a great profit-maker before the war it would not be treated as making war profits under existing law if its profits after the war were no larger than they were before the war. The Secretary of the Treasury assured the committee, however, that his war-profits plan, based upon the English system, would raise more revenue for the Government than would the excess-profits plan without regard to the prewar basis. The war-profits plan, with the excess-profits plan as an alternative, was therefore included in the bill, so that time alone can tell whether the one is more just and equitable than the other or whether favoritism or injustice may be worked by either. Meanwhile, with all respect to the brilliant mental processes of the arithmetical and statistical experts to whose tender mercy the taxpayers' returns must ultimately go, the average small business man is relegated, as Dr. Adams said in another part of his magazine article, to "distinctions so capricious as to be maddening."

LOANS A BIG FACTOR.

The hearings disclosed a commendable anxiety on the part of the Treasury Department concerning the effects of taxation upon the sale of loans. With $12,000,000,000 already spent and $24,000,000,000 to be raised before the end of June next, a war expense to date of approximately $36,000,000,000, an unheard-of total in the annals of American finance, it is not to be wondered at that the Treasury Department should endeavor to safeguard the loan situation. Speaking for the administration, Mr. McAdoo was frank with the committee about the urgency of loans to supplement taxes. It is suspected that the desire to encourage the sale of liberty bonds had something to do with an apparent change of front by the Treasury Department on the subject of earned and unearned incomes, since the Secretary in his letter of June 5 urged a higher rate for unearned incomes than for earned incomes. It will be recalled that earlier messages indicated that unearned incomes ought to be treated very much as they are in Great Britain. What the Secretary in his letter of June 5 actually said upon this subject was, "There should be a substantial increase in the amount of normal income tax upon so-called unearned incomes." This was at a time when complaint was widespread that under existing law men who worked with hand or brain for what they earned should be preferred above those who clip coupons or sit idly by waiting for their remittances. Because of the loan situation, however, the differential of 3 per cent upon unearned incomes was finally stricken from the bill apparently with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. For substantially the same reason the normal income-tax rates were raised and some of the higher brackets were lowered after the committee had decided to increase them to reach the larger incomes.

As with many other provisions of the bill it is difficult to explain these income-tax changes. They were not in the interest of the man with the smaller income, whose taxes under this bill, it is confidently believed, will be more burdensome in proportion to those of the larger taxpayer than it was intended in the earlier drafts of the measure that they should be. The man of small income, say $10,000 a year, will be heavily hit by the new rates, and after meeting the high cost of living will have little left to set aside for investment or for business ventures. The man whose income amounts to a million or more will pay heavily, but the margin of income left to him under the new system proposed by this bill will be able, if he pleases, to invest a comfortable sum in liberty bonds.

That raises the very important question, so ably discussed in his opening speech by the gentleman from North Carolina, whether we are now proceeding with respect to loans and taxes upon a safe and sane basis. It is not altogether popular to advocate a "pay-as-you-go" policy in war times, although it must be admitted that such a policy in a great war like this would be impracticable. If taxes become too burdensome, the loan system is available so long as the people have money to buy bonds, but few economists would contend that this great war should be financed by bonds alone. An overplus of loans might have a tendency to prolong the war and to unduly enrich the profiteers at the expense of legitimate business. If we were inclined to be clever or cunning we might avoid all taxation and permit profits to accumulate by borrowing ad libitum and passing the burden on to future generations. The President thus far and the Secretary of the Treasury have not advocated any such policy. But this bill is brought closer to it, I am persuaded, than it was originally intended should be the case. The belief that future generations should share in the cost of this war is justified by our previous war experience, but it must not be overlooked that future generations include the very men we now send to war for the great sacrifice. The interest-bearing obligations we are piling up for the decades to come must be borne just as much by the men who return from France, the men who are serving their country for a pittance, as by those who do not fight. No one can tell to what extent these loans will go nor to what heights the interest obligations will mount. The present generation, which is profiting by the war while millions of the future taxpayers are fighting to make profits possible, should certainly not be permitted to smugly shift the burden, nor should our laws be so framed as to permit our Government bonds to fall into the hands of so few of the people as to place the interest-paying burden, which is also a tax-paying burden, upon the many. I approve the bond issues thus far made, and shall heartily support the Secretary of the Treasury in his efforts to dispose of the Fourth liberty loan, but I believe there should be a wider distribution of these Government bonds, a desideration that can only be accomplished by encouraging the smaller income earner to invest in them. Upon such a general distribution of bonds might ultimately depend not only the stability of the various issues but the security of the Nation against possible revolution or repudiation.

DEMAND FOR TAX-FREE BONDS.

It is noticeable that large investors have recently forced the 3½ per cent tax-free liberty bonds to a premium, and that the farm-loan issues, which, while not specifically guaranteed by the Government, are tax free, have taken the same course. A tax upon these farm loans was suggested, but the Treasury was not in favor of it, and the committee did not include them in the taxable class.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman know any reason why those bonds were not included in the taxable class?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. None, except that after full discussion it was reported that the Secretary of the Treasury had decided it would not be advisable to tax them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So that that was simply another part of the bill that went as the Secretary of the Treasury concluded it should go?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To that extent, yes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Are those the identical bonds that the Federal Farm Loan Board said a few months ago could not be sold, and we had to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to buy $100,000,000 worth of them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are the identical bonds now selling at a premium and going into the hands of those who are skilled in investments.

Mr. PLATT. I hope the Members of the House will recall some of the predictions made on this floor in regard to those bonds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Those bonds are to be tax free, and are thus given an exceptional privilege over the Government bonds themselves, and particularly over municipal and county and State bonds, which are now to be taxed.

Municipal, State, and county bonds are included for taxation under this bill. Thus we have exceptions and distinctions in the matter of these war investments which may produce friction and irritation. If this bill, by raising the normal income tax and reducing in proportion the higher surtaxes, will have the effect of preventing the masses from purchasing liberty bonds, it may not be satisfactory to its framers. It is highly important in these strenuous times that encouragement should be given particularly to the small-business man who risks his capital in order that he may keep the wheels turning during the war.

A FEW STATES HEAVILY TAXED.

I desire now to comment briefly upon that portion of the President's address to Congress in which he says:

> The present tax laws are marred * * * by inequalities which ought to be remedied.

Could the President have had in mind that under existing laws, according to "Statistics of Income," compiled by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from the returns of 1916, and reported to Congress June 1, 1918, that 10 States of our total of 51 States and Territories paid more than 78 per cent of all the corporation and personal income taxes? Let me enumerate these States so that we may better understand where, under existing law, the burden of taxation falls. New York paid more than 35 per cent, Pennsylvania more than 11 per cent, Illinois more than 7 per cent, Ohio and Massachusetts nearly 6 per cent each, Michigan and New Jersey more than 3 per cent, California more than 2½ per cent, Delaware and Connecticut approximately 2 per cent each. There you have the story of the income tax and the corporation taxes in a nutshell. Ten States in 1916 paid approximately four-fifths of all the taxes, while the remaining 41 States and Territories paid but one-fifth.

If we were permitted to discuss politics in this bill——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The tax is not paid by States. If you take the very States you name, do you not find that these income taxes come from a few of the people of a few cities in those States?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They come very largely from the large cities. That is true.

Mr. HARDY. And the main bulk of the people of those States pay no more income tax than the people of other States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bulk of it falls upon the people of a very few States.

Mr. HARDY. You mean on a few of the people of a few big cities?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Upon the industries of the cities and States rather than the raw material.

Mr. HARDY. But the vast multitudes of the people in your State pay no more income tax than the vast multitudes of the people in my State.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think that statement is borne out by the facts, as I shall disclose.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. Have you the figures showing what the individuals in Oklahoma pay? Have you the place which Oklahoma as a State occupies in paying the individual income tax?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not at this moment.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understood it was sixth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that Oklahoma has a creditable record in the payment of taxes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think Oklahoma stands sixth in the payment of the individual income tax.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oklahoma has a very good record, I will say to the gentleman.

I say if we were permitted to discuss politics in this bill, if we could speak of it as disassociated from the war, we might suggest that the administration in the prewar period received its strongest political support from those States which pay but one-fifth of the taxes. It is a coincidence, and not unworthy of mention at this time, that the expenditure of the funds raised by taxes and by loans has been generally distributed throughout all the States. They have certainly not been restricted to the 10 States which have made so admirable a taxpaying record. We have spent enormous sums for shipyards, nitrate plants, cantonments, training camps, aviation, housing, ordnance plants, proving grounds, warehouses, schools, and a variety of Army and Naval Establishments; and the 41 States and Territories which paid the one-fifth of the income and corporation taxes were treated with equal or greater consideration than those which paid the four-fifths. In the Construction Division, for instance, how were the various States considered in the apportionment of funds? A perusal of 176 contracts amounting to upward of $320,000,000, mostly on the 10 per cent cost-plus plan—and that is but a handful of all the contracts entered into by the War Department through its various bureaus and divisions—enables us to briefly analyze this distribution. The contracts from the Construction Division awarded to stations in Louisiana were four in number and aggregated more than $3,200,000. California contracts numbered 10, amounting to over $7,000,000. Kansas had 4 contracts for over $9,100,000; New Mexico, 5 contracts for over $2,300,000; Oklahoma, 4 contracts for more than $3,300,000; Michigan, 2 contracts for $617,000; Massachusetts, 5 contracts for $12,650,000; Iowa, 3 contracts for $1,500,000; Georgia, 11 contracts, $19,100,000; Illinois, 5 contracts, $9,500,000; North Carolina, 4 contracts, $4,000,000; South Carolina, 9 contracts, $18,000,000; Washington, 9 contracts, $9,500,000; Florida, 6 contracts, $5,700,000; Texas, 23 contracts, $17,400,000; Maryland, 9 contracts, $12,600,000; New York, 10 contracts, $16,300,000; Mississippi, 2 contracts, $3,600,000; Alabama, 7 contracts, $4,900,000; Ohio, 2 contracts, $10,300,000; Kentucky, 3 contracts, $6,900,000; Indiana, 1 contract, $875,000; Arkansas, 7 contracts, $12,000,000; West Virginia, 1 contract, $70,000,000; Wisconsin, 2 contracts, $23,668; Delaware, 1 contract, $31,123; Connecticut, 2 contracts, $223,126; Missouri, 2 contracts, $2,500,000; Pennsylvania, 2 contracts, $3,100,000; Porto Rico, 1 contract, $1,700,000; New Jersey, 14 contracts, $29,200,000; Utah, 1 contract, $349,000. These contracts, as I have indicated, are for the Construction Division only, and cover the period between May, 1917, and June, 1918, inclusive. It may be assumed that the distribution of funds for other important work of the Army and Navy aggregating billions in the matter of Army contracts, and for the construction of nitrate plants, which may be of little or no service during the war, since expenditures have already been stopped with regard to one of them, has been relatively general and unprecedentedly generous.

ARE TAXES FAIRLY PROPORTIONED?

"We need not be afraid to tax them," said the President to Congress, "if we lay the taxes justly." But the President also said that existing tax laws were marred "by inequalities which ought to be remedied." Let us resume our study, then, of the Treasury Department's "Statistics of Income" compiled from the returns for 1916. On page 7 of that interesting volume, which was called for by an act of Congress, some startling figures are presented with respect to personal income-tax returns. Well may the President have said that existing law is marred by certain inequalities. It might with equal propriety be added that something seems to have been radically wrong in the whole income tax-raising scheme. The statistics given on page 7 do not support the theory that taxes, though supposed to be uniform, have been uniformly collected. It may be that the Treasury Department has not had at its service a sufficient number of collectors to properly cover the task assigned to it, but with such facilities as it had the returns made for 22 selected occupations in proportion to the number of persons engaged therein throughout the United States show a weakness of administrative efficiency or a gross contempt for the law. From the official returns it appears that of all the architects in the United States, a total of 16,613, as shown by the census of 1910, only 1,419, or 8.54 per cent, filed income-tax returns. Of authors, editors, and reporters only 2,529 in a total of 38,750 reported. Of clergymen, from a total of 118,018, only 1,671, or 1.42 per cent, reported. Civil employees to the number of 382,138, including mayors and other public officials, exempt as to their official salaries, reported as to their other income only to the extent of 2,992, or seventy-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Evidently the income of military men was higher than that of civil officeholders, since 7.08 per cent reported. In the theatrical profession the returns for all the actors, singers, and musicians—the Carusos, Pickfords, Fairbanks, Harts, and Sousas—were but 914 for a total of 167,607, or fifty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent. Other of the selected occupations reported higher percentages, but brokers, the highest of them all, reported only to the extent of 20.77 per cent. Of civil and mining engineers, 11.24 per cent made returns; of lawyers and judges, 18.97 per cent; of physicians, surgeons, oculists, dentists, and so forth, 6.97 per cent; of real-estate brokers, 4.88 per cent; of stock and bond brokers, 20.68 per cent; of commercial travelers, 4.57 per cent; of insurance men, 8.19 per cent; of lumbermen, 10.76 per cent; of manufacturers, 10.05 per cent; of mine owners and operators, 17.88 per cent; of theater owners and managers, 2.58 per cent; and of the 1,246,077 merchants, storekeepers, jobbers, commission merchants, and so forth, only 4.36 per cent. Strange as it may seem the income tax caught only 1,311 saloon keepers of a total of 68,215, or 1.92 per cent of the whole number. This amazingly small percentage, oddly enough, was an exact fifty one-hundredths of 1 per cent higher than the percentage of returns by clergymen.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The average salary of the clergymen of the United States is stated to be only $600 a year. Of course a clergyman would not be able to make returns.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be true. I appreciate the gentleman's interest in the clergymen. I am glad he goes to church once in a while. Let that be put in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will follow my example. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I try to. This is evidence either of extremely low incomes or very poor service in making returns to the Government.

INCOMES OF BUSINESS MEN AND FARMERS.

Of teachers, including college and university officials, to the number of 614,905, only forty-seven one-hundredths of 1 per cent made returns. The returns from "all other business" not enumerated in the list of selected occupations represented but 18.28 per cent of a total of 101,868. That was the best the Commissioner of Internal Revenue could show by way of income-tax returns for 1916, percentages of collections from big and little business ranging from forty-seven one-hundredths of 1 per cent to 20.77 per cent only. Salaried men and millionaires alike were included within that less than 21 per cent of the business, professional, and manufacturing life of the United States, and 79 per cent of the population so classified and employed paid no income tax at all. The most remarkable figures presented in the commissioner's statement of selected occupations pertained to agriculturists, farmers, stock raisers, orchardists, and so forth. Of these, 6,047,615 were enumerated in the census of 1910, but only 14,407, or twenty-four one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the whole number, were credited with having filed returns in 1916.

Come to think of it, perhaps the only 100 per cent taxpayers in 1916 were the Members of Congress, who have been so often and so ignorantly given a deferred classification. Not a single

Member of the House escaped making a return, since the genial Sergeant at Arms docked the monthly warrants to the amount of the income tax and personally saw that it was turned into the Treasury. The Treasury compilation, however, does not include the Members of Congress in the table to which I have called attention.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I understand the gentleman correctly, these statistics were made up at a time when the exemption was much larger than it is now. It was then $4,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And, of course, the gentleman will understand that there is not a very large number of farmers whose net income is $4,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the farmers as a whole were as prosperous in 1916 as they are now. It seems amazing that men who receive the high prices which the public has been paying to the farmer for his product should not have made $4,000 in 1916.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he thought the farmers were as prosperous in 1914 as they are now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said 1916. At that time the European war had been in progress two years, and——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that the cotton crop made in 1914, which was sold in 1915, was an enormous loss.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am dealing with the figures of 1916. They were the returns for 1915, reported in 1916, and brought to Congress only in 1918.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The Department of Agriculture made a survey in three States and published a bulletin on that survey, covering the States of Illinois, Iowa, and Indiana, and in those three States it was found that the average earnings on capital invested by the farmer were about 3.1 per cent profit—an average in those States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Profit?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad, then, to have raised this question, because it may do good both to the farmer and his customer to find out why it is, if the profit to the farmer is so small, the cost of living to the consumer of farm products is so high. It may lead to an investigation that will be of advantage to both parties.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no need of an investigation. It has been investigated already. Dr. Spillman, of the Department of Agriculture, in the Bureau of Farm Management, reports that $402 is the average income of a farmer with a family of six. As to the increase in the cost of living, the cause of that is well known to everybody. The cause of it is that we had $900,000,000 pinned on to the American people in addition to the freight rates we are paying.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the farmer get more for his eggs to-day than he got in 1916?

Mr. HAUGEN. He does.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Eggs are selling now in my city for 70 and 75 cents a dozen. With such very high prices for the consumer to pay, it would seem that the farmer is getting a fair proportion of that very high price. I hope he is.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think he gets part of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If he does, he ought to pay an income tax along with the men who buy the eggs. He can claim credit in the income-tax return for the high price paid for labor.

HARDSHIPS OF THE FARMERS.

Mr. HAUGEN. But the farmers in some sections of the country are paying $100 for labor where they before paid only $25 or $30. That expense is increasing, and on the wagons——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think he credits that high cost of labor in his income-tax return.

Mr. HAUGEN. The point I want to make is this, that according to Dr. Spillman's statement the farmer gets $402, and according to this bill he is entitled to an exemption of $2,000, provided he is a married man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the intense interest the gentleman from Iowa takes in the farmer. He comes from a great farming State. I am not attacking his constituents. I am bringing this question up because it does seem that the administration has not exercised due diligence in recovering the income tax from all the people of the country, even though it may be that some farmers, because they have not been approached upon the subject, because the matter has not been made known to them, because the revenue collector did not come around, have unconsciously avoided doing their full duty in the matter of the income tax.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. I want in this instance to congratulate the country on the gentleman's efforts to make the collections more efficient by putting in an appropriation of $7,500,000 in this bill and authorizing the increase of the salaries of collectors of customs in order that this may be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman from Texas deserves most of the credit for that clause. I think he may be said to be the "father" of the amendment which is now before us, creating 2,500 new offices for men who will serve the Revenue Department in an effort to reach these 6,000,000 farmers and 1,200,000 merchants and others who have not hitherto paid taxes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman give the number employed at the present time—some estimate?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The number of farmers employed?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; the number of tax collectors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a very large number; but the department says it is wholly insufficient to meet the requirements.

Mr. KNUTSON. What are the requirements?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I am approaching that question rapidly.

Mr. GARNER. I do not think my colleague on the committee ought to detract from the real credit for this very meritorious provision in this bill. If I may state what occurred in the committee, the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FORDNEY] made this motion, and instead of increasing the number 2,500 it increases it nearly 2,700. There are now something over 9,000 employees in the Internal-Revenue Department, and my recollection is that this amendment carries it up to about 11,000; and I want to congratulate the Republican side of the House for their generosity in making these new places and for their wise judgment in providing for the enforcement of the law, so that we can get at these farmers, whom my friend from Pennsylvania seems to be very much worried about.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is fair to the gentleman from Texas to say that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and myself, along with the gentleman from Texas, are, and always have been, amongst the real friends of the farmers of the country.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman, in his efforts on the committee, obtain any intimation as to the proportion of these places which would be distributed among the members of the Committee on Ways and Means on the Democratic side?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was decided in the committee, as I recall, to deal with this question in a wholly nonpartisan spirit [laughter], and to enable the administration to appoint whom it saw fit, since we are informed that the administration now has very great difficulty in getting enough "deserving Democrats" to keep the work current.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. On the question of the prosperity of the farmer, did not the farmers make very large investments in bonds during the last two or three years?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is said the farmer was one of the best buyers of liberty bonds, for which I congratulate him and the country.

Mr. LONDON. But there was no evidence of his prosperity when it came to the payment of the income taxes.

FEW RETURNS IN MANY STATES.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would not want to say that. It is certainly no reflection upon the farmer whose cotton and grain and food supplies have been going to our allies since the European war began in 1914, and whose products have attained their highest prices in the United States since we entered the war, April 6, 1917, to say that the revenue collectors must have been busy investigating corporations when that heroic band of 14,407 farmers contributed of their incomes to the needs of the Government in 1916. It is such an interesting study that I shall briefly pursue it into some of the States for the purpose of ascertaining how the Government is assisted by her taxpaying citizens. In Alabama, a great cotton-growing State, which comes first in alphabetical order, I find that 40 agriculturists, farmers, stock raisers, and orchardists made income tax returns for 1916. The lawyers and judges were more numerous than farmers, 142 reporting. In California, a great fruit-growing State, 1,659 agriculturists, farmers, stock raisers, and orchardists reported. In Mississippi the number of farmers reporting was 256; in Connecticut, 67; in Georgia, 123; in Illinois, 1,442; in Louisiana, 250; in Kansas, 716; in Kentucky, 281; in New York, 589; in Florida, 87; in Iowa, 1,287; in Texas, 1,120; in Washington, 952; in Missouri, 244; in Nebraska, 571; in Oklahoma, 101; in Oregon, 414; in Virginia, 151; in Pennsylvania, 266; in South Carolina, 87; in Ohio, 270; in Tennessee, 179; and in the great wheat-growing State of North Dakota, 108. I will not go further into detail. These are the official figures for agriculturists, farmers, stock raisers, and orchardists, including cotton planters, sugar growers, and tobacco producers, a grand total of 14,407 who came within the Treasury's income dragnet in 1916, leaving 6,033,208 to be accounted for. If Josh Billings or David Harum were to take a squint at these statistics and try to harmonize the success of the revenue office in seeing some and blinking others of the country's taxpayers they might appreciate the humor of the situation as presented by this official report. In justice to the Treasury Department, however, it should be stated that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Roper, acknowledged the susceptibility to criticism of these returns and defended their inadequacy only upon the ground that the official force at his command was not sufficient to cope with the emergency.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is so persistent that I will yield; but time is fleeting.

Mr. KNUTSON. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to be very much concerned over the farmers. Is he aware of the fact that the Dupont Powder Co. have increased their earnings 2,000 per cent since the war was declared?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not hurt my feelings any by bringing public attention to that fact, if true.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is true, according to the Financial Digest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may be; but that is a matter of profits; it has no particular bearing upon these returns on income taxes. If the Dupont Powder Co. or any other large concern does not pay its fair proportion of taxes it ought to be made to do so; and one of my contentions is that this bill is so framed that that particular kind of a company will have a better show for its white alley and more chance for its surplus than the man who earns $10,000 or less. As I figure it out, the small-income earner will get the worst of it if the larger surpluses are enabled to absorb the liberty bonds.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Was it not developed in the hearings that the largest increase of personal income taxes to be paid under the reduction of exemptions which the last revenue bill provided would come from the farmers of the United States? Was it not so testified by a representative of the Treasury Department?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was expected that the farmer would be a large purchaser of liberty bonds.

Mr. SLOAN. I mean was it not shown that when they reduced the exemption from $4,000 to $2,000, the largest increase from any class of taxpayers in the country under the income-tax law would be from the farmers?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is right. There was such a suggestion.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman if he understands what the average value of a farm in the State of Pennsylvania is?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not tell at this moment; I have put it in the RECORD on previous occasions. Perhaps the gentleman has the figures.

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know? I understand it is something less than $5,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be; all this helps to clarify the situation that I am bringing to the attention of the House. There are certain indisputable official facts, but all of them may be susceptible of explanation. I am putting the situation before the House so that gentlemen having information may elucidate.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

INQUIRY BY THE GENTLEMAN FROM TEXAS.

Mr. GARNER. In view of what the gentleman said about not wishing to be interrupted, may I refer back to the criticism he made on the work of the committee or those responsible for the bill? It is my impression that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had as much to do as any member of the committee outside of the chairman in making up the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I helped all I could, but the gentleman honors me overmuch.

Mr. GARNER. His photograph is on nearly every page of the bill, and I congratulate the country that it had the benefit of his services. What I wanted to ask was in what particular, if he would point out, does he disagree with the provisions of the bill? I know of only two propositions which the gentleman did not succeed in putting through, and I can state them if he desires.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am coming to that.

Mr. GARNER. I hope the gentleman will. There were only two propositions that the gentleman really insisted upon that he did not succeed in putting over the committee, and sometimes over my protest and over that of the gentleman from Michigan and the chairman of the committee. Therefore I was a little surprised at the tenor of the gentleman's criticism of the bill because his mark of genius is on every page of the bill, and I would like to have him point out what he disagrees to in detail.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state whether the "genius" to which he refers was on the pro or con side of the question, and on what particular page?

Mr. GARNER. Most of them are included, but some of them I might mention were cut out. There are only two propositions, and I hope that the gentleman will discuss them before he takes his seat.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am now discussing the raising of the normal income tax, which I think was a mistake. It is very far-reaching.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will discuss the two very important points he raised in the committee upon which he did not have his way, I would like to have him do so, because I think the House is entitled to know upon what he bases his criticism. If he will permit me, I will say what they are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennylvania. I will do the best I can.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman want me to name them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will need a little more time to go fully into the matters that the gentleman wants me to speak about. And at the same time, while opportunity is ripe, I wish to pay a public tribute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. He seldom makes a speech on this floor, and thus denies the public the benefit of his wisdom, but in committee he is so adroit and skillful a legislator that few can equal him. The people of Texas have reason to be proud of him. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Did those matters the gentleman from Texas speaks about have anything to do with the tax on Angora-goat hair?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is behind us for the present. We dare not discuss the tariff under these auspices.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. According to the figures given by the gentleman from Texas we have 18 collectors employed in every congressional district. Does the gentleman seriously believe that it is necessary to increase that number?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would have to ask how the number of collectors compares with the number of farmers. Perhaps you could get at it in that way.

Mr. HAUGEN. You have 18 collectors in each district.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Hardly enough to go around in Texas. Under this bill they may get more.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say that I have had a number of letters from people in my State supporting the dog tax proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am coming to the dog tax, a very important item overlooked by the committee. [Laughter.]

ANOTHER GENTLEMAN FROM TEXAS.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. What I want to know is, Are there not men in the towns that own a good deal of farm land? For instance, here is a merchant who pays an income tax and a part of his income comes from the farm and a part from the merchandise business. Does that show up his income tax as a farmer or is it put down solely to the merchant? In other words, I am a merchant and I carry on also a farm; does the farm get any credit from the officials in the income tax? I think it likely such a man would call himself a merchant and his entire income tax would be credited to the merchant class.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not answer the gentleman offhand.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not possible that hundreds of thousands of dollars of farm income are in that way credited to other classes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean that the different sources of business are classified?

Mr. HARDY. No; but here is a lawyer in Texas and he may own several farms and may pay an income tax, but gives his profession as a lawyer, so that his income-tax payment is credited to him as a lawyer and not as a farmer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In this tabulation he would be reported as a lawyer.

Mr. HARDY. And the farm would get no credit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. HARDY. Is the gentleman aware that in most of the agricultural States a good many of the farmers are engaged in other business and are listed as such?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be; I am not raising any question as to that. I am dealing with a Treasury compilation of specified occupations.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say that as to these men whose business is solely farming, living on small farms, less than one-tenth of 1 per cent make an income of over $4,000, and they are not ashamed of it; they are not capitalists.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one hour more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the time is in the control of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania such time as he wishes in which to conclude.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will not dispute the statement of facts made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. I have no doubt there are numerous small farmers who do not come within the income-tax-paying class, but my information is that there are many small farmers and probably very many included in these 6,000,000 who rely on larger farmers who in turn probably would be able to make an income-tax return.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman yield a little further, because I think he is doing an injustice to the farming industry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not hitting at any particular line of business or any particular farmer. This is a general statement. My information is, however, that while there are many small farmers on 40-acre tracts, for instance, who do not make enough themselves by their toil to pay an income tax, yet they are dependent upon larger farmers who do make enough to enable them to pay income tax, and I am rather surprised that only 40 of such farmers made an income-tax return in the great State of Alabama, for instance.

Mr. HARDY. What I wanted to get at was this: Down in the State of Texas the Taft ranch, for instance, no doubt makes a vast income this year. It is not even included as a Texas income. It comes from the owner of it, Mr. Taft, who is in Ohio and who pays that tax. Yet there is a big farm that makes a big income and does not show at all as a Texas tax on the income-tax list, and I have no doubt that that kind of thing occurs all over the West and the South; but when the gentleman speaks of the income tax paid in the big cities, he can find the same illustration in the very States in which those cities are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And we will find in the big cities, also, very many poor men, not farmers, working honestly and hard for a living, who do not make enough to justify an income-tax return, and they may be included with those whom the revenue collector does not see.

Mr. HARDY. So that when the gentleman comes to the fine point it means that the rich pay the income taxes, while the poor, whether in city or country, in his State or mine, do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To a certain extent there is something in that argument.

Mr. HARDY. All in it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the rich do not necessarily mean those who are disassociated from large business enterprises that are turning the wheels of industry everywhere and giving employment to those who do not pay income taxes. That should also be considered.

MORE TALK ABOUT THE FARM.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For one question.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows that the standard western farm is 160 acres, but there are a great many 320-acre and 640-acre and larger farms, and they must make, if they are occupied by anyone who knows anything about farming, more than $1,000 a year, if they count their living expenses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some of them are very poor farms, but others unquestionably require a great deal of capital for operating expenses. I think the fact is that it takes so much capital to run some of the larger farms, or ranches, or plantations that the farmer probably keeps books and knows exactly where he stands from one year's end to another.

Mr. PLATT. And is it not a fact that a great many of those farmers do not deduct their living expenses?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am sorry to say that the other workingman whose high wages have been referred to is not permitted to deduct his living expenses. His doctor's bills amount to as high as those of the millionaire, and yet he has no right to deduct his doctor's bills. Such expenses are charged against the man of small income and no allowance is made, and yet under this bill the man of larger income will be able to cover his household expenses and keep on a par with everything that is going on in society, and have a large surplus left at the end with which to buy liberty bonds.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Did Mr. Roper intimate that he thought that farmers were escaping taxation any more than the people in the city of Philadelphia or in any other city?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He did not speak of Philadelphia just as specifically as the gentleman from Illinois has spoken of it, but he did say that the lapses, the inability of the department to reach offending taxpayers, or those who had not made returns, was fairly general.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Let me say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as I understand his argument, infers that the Secretary said that failures to pay were among the farmers. He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I have not made any such statement. The gentleman is entirely in error. I took the list of 22 selected occupations compiled by the Treasury Department, including farmers, and the shoe pinches apparently when we touch the farming districts. The facts are submitted by the department. I have not failed to incorporate the men from my own city, I have not failed to include men working in the shipyards, in the factories, men who are working everywhere as hard as the farmer does, and who buy the farmer's product—I have not failed to incorporate them. I have given an unbiased general statement taken from the official returns of the Department of the Treasury. It shows that only 14,000 plus of a total of more than 6,000,000 farmers—agriculturists, orchardists, and cattle raisers, planters, and others in the country—made returns under this administration in 1916.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman another question. Is not the fact on which the gentleman bases the insinuation that farmers are to escape——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not made any insinuation against the farmer as a class. I have simply quoted from the official statistics with which the gentleman is as familiar as I am.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Let me ask this question, then: Does the gentleman think that the farmers are more dishonest in making returns of taxes——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; the gentleman can not put that up to me. I tell the farmer the truth, and do not deceive him, and if he can not stand it he is a weaker citizen than I thought him to be.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not go around my district fooling the workmen about what we do in Congress. I tell them the truth, and if I represented a farming district I would do the same thing. I would let them know the facts; I would not deceive them even so far as to say that if they sent me to Washington I would show "them city fellers where they got off." [Laughter.]

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Is the gentleman insinuating——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois is insinuating; I am not.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania insinuated——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has used the term; I have not used it. It is not in my mind to use it.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. That Members representing farming districts do that sort of thing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think perhaps it has been done. [Laughter.] I think I could quote some very able speeches along that line—none from my distinguished friend from Illinois, however. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I only want to ask the gentleman what was the exemption permitted to the Federal taxpayer with relation to the tax of 1916?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Three thousand and four thousand dollars according——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Three thousand for the unmarried men and $4,000 for the married man. To my mind that explains a good deal——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It might. I think that is fair.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Very few farmers throughout the country——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But does the gentleman down in his heart of hearts believe that only 40 farmers, agriculturists, orchardists, and so forth, made $4,000 in the great State of Alabama in the year 1916? Does he, really?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I can say to my friend I am not familiar with agriculture in Alabama.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am sorry the gentleman is not better informed, but I believe down in the gentleman's heart of hearts he will agree with me that if only 40 farmers reported they had earned only $4,000 a year in the great State of Alabama——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to say, to my mind——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). Or take a great wheat State, the State of North Dakota. Now, does the gentleman down in that great expansive heart of his believe that only 108 farmers made at least $4,000 in 1916 when Europe was demanding all the wheat that we could raise, and we were raising it out there to beat the band?

NORTH DAKOTA SEES THE POINT.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield. The gentleman from North Dakota is certainly entitled to recognition.

Mr. BAER. I think we can relieve this situation. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is trying to reflect on the farmer; he is a friend of the farmer——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Correct. I do not want the gentleman to compliment me; I want the gentleman to ask his question.

Mr. BAER. I want to say this—we can relieve the situation. Does not the gentleman think it is not the question of the farmers not wanting to pay as it is the inefficiency of the Treasury Department to go out and make the returns?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is getting very close to it. [Laughter.] The gentleman is getting to a point which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois did not grasp. We must pass it up to the gentleman from North Dakota; but he understands that to go further might involve a political discussion.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman now seems to see what we are driving at. [Laughter.] We are not permitted to talk politics while this war in Europe is going on. "Politics is adjourned." I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. The question I want to ask the gentleman is this: Can the gentleman inform the House in these other classes of laboring men how much increased taxes they have reported? Over in Hog Island I am told laboring men get as much as $20 a day. How much do the other classes of laboring men—farmers are laboring men—how much do they report?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If what the gentleman says is true, does he not think that there is just a little dereliction on the part of the revenue officers in not getting the income tax from $20-per-day men?

Mr. GOOD. It may be.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think we should vote more money into the Treasury Department to find more agents to get these $20-a-day men? That is equal to the salary of a Congressman, and they will pay $470 and more under this bill.

Mr. GOOD. I want to know what other classes of labor report. Did Alabama have other classes of laboring men?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, they have shipyards down in Alabama. Why does the gentleman pick out Hog Island or Alabama?

Mr. GOOD. Tell us how many of those high-priced mechanics in Alabama reported an income tax? I hope the gentleman will answer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think very few of them.

Mr. GOOD. None at all. The farmer alone, as a laborer, was singled out by the gentleman when all these others did not report at all. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to observe from the enthusiastic applause that greets the gentleman's utterance that the farmer still has a few friends in this House. I was beginning to despair. But so long as the gentleman had made a statement in line with that made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], whom I esteem highly, but who was mistaken about that, I will say that if the gentleman had been in his seat listening to this speech, which is becoming more eloquent as time goes on [laughter], he would have observed that I have brought in every one of the occupations the Treasury Department reported upon. I made no exception. I read them right down the line. I came to the farmer in due course, and am glad of it, because the farmer actually needs somebody to speak for him in the House of Representatives.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield now.

REVENUE SERVICE NEEDS HELP.

And it should also be stated that since the report for 1916, the activities of the Treasury Department have necessarily increased because of new war legislation. It appears from a special report from the Senate forwarded July 19, 1918, that a more systematic effort is being made to reach those who are justly taxable, but who escape taxation. The 1916 report showed that only 437,036 tax returns were received from our total population of approximately 110,000,000 people. The latest available report from the Secretary of the Treasury shows the internal-revenue collections for the fiscal year 1918 to have reached a grand total from all the States and Territories of $3,694,703,334.05. This total includes income and excess-profits taxes and other miscellaneous taxes provided for by law collected since the United States entered the war. It is significant again that approximately half of this tremendous sum, or $1,792,889,000, is collected in three States—New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois.

That is where you got one-half of your income, corporation, and miscellaneous taxes in the last fiscal year.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any figures to show what percentage of the contracts were let to the three States that paid 50 per cent of the taxes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will give the gentleman some information on that point in a moment.

During the hearings the Secretary of the Treasury himself admitted that the department was far behind in its collection of income and excess profits taxes. He made that the basis of a plea for a large appropriation, which this bill carries, to provide the Internal Revenue Commissioner with about 2,500 additional employees to audit returns that have not yet been reached and to otherwise systematize and develop the collection service. The Secretary spoke of the possible escape of profiteers and others from taxes imposed by existing law, and ventured the suggestion that if given the additional help desired he would be able to collect at least $1,000,000,000 that would otherwise be lost. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Roper, expressed the opinion that if given the desired employees he could get his work current by July 1, 1919, and could keep it so thereafter. The commissioner further stated that it was his intention to go after the millions of men who appear not to have reported under existing income-tax law and bring them to account. His testimony indicated his purpose to fall in line with the President's suggestion regarding the justice and equity of taxation. He declared it to be the purpose of the department to so reorganize the revenue service as "to get, on one hand, every man who has not made a return, so far as we can, and on the other hand, every man who has made a deficient or defective return." And this he said would include the farmers, stock raisers, and orchardists, as well as the corporations, business men, industrialists, and professional men, whose war incomes would warrant their making financial contributions toward the winning of the war.

I have gone into this matter of collections somewhat in detail, because so much depends upon the administrative features of a revenue law. If in these war times the Treasury can not keep up with its work, or its accounts become confused, the doors may be open to inequities and injustices, not to say favoritism, for which the lawmaking body should not be held responsible. It is a matter of grave concern that so much as $1,000,000,000 back taxes should be outstanding and subject to loss because the administrative officials are incapable of performing the heavy task assigned them, or should be obliged, which is not charged, to permit favorite or scheming taxpayers to avoid their fair share of the war burden. Such evasions of responsibility by those whom the department does not bring within the taxable class, certainly to the extent of the sums uncollected, add to the burden of the patriotic and law-observing taxpayers who do their full duty in this regard. In one particular instance during the committee's investigation it developed—and I refer to this only by way of illustration—that the department had sent out to business men and others, whose establishments throughout the country could be readily located, more than 300,000 notices, and that in consequence of this extensive effort only 30,000 returns were received. That left unaccounted for at least 270,000 individuals and concerns in certain lines of business who apparently gave no heed to the Treasury admonition. It is possible that many of the 270,000 had died or gone out of business, but the deficiency was so marked as to suggest that the Treasury Department was sadly in need of a thorough and more workmanlike system. A continuance of the existing system could certainly not make for justice or equality of taxation.

TAXES NOT WIDELY DISTRIBUTED.

And discussion of these details is permissible for other and more important reasons. If only three States pay half of all the income and excess profits and miscellaneous taxes for the fiscal year 1918, it is perfectly fair to inquire why, when expenditures are generally distributed, taxes should be so sectionalized. It is undeniably true, as a perusal of the returns will show, that the Northern States are most heavily taxed. At the same time it is good to know that the purchase of liberty bonds has been thoroughly well sustained in the Southern States. The inference is that the Southern States, so far as net returns are concerned, are in as fairly good shape in respect to liberty bonds as are the Northern States. I do not raise the sectional question, because I am glad to see the South prosperous, and rejoice that its banks and financial institutions are in better condition now than they ever were in the history of the country. But the President tells us that there is profiteering and that our present tax laws are marred by "inequalities which ought to be remedied." When it appears in the report of the Ways and Means Committee in support of the great bill we now have under consideration that of the more than $8,000,000,000 to be raised $5,576,186,000 must be raised from income, corporation, and excess profits, one-half of all of which are to be raised in three industrial States, one may be pardoned for observing that it does not look equitable or fair, even though it may be. Take up for yourselves the recapitulation on page 40 of the report and the proof of this assertion lies before you. The total sum to be raised is $8,182,492,000, and the three items which are to provide the bulk of it and which fall chiefly, as I have indicated, upon a very few of the 51 States and Territories are as follows:

Individual income tax	$1,482,186,000
Corporation tax	894,000,000
Excess-profits tax	3,200,000,000
	5,576,186,000
Add to this the amount which the administration expects to raise from beverages	1,137,000,000
A total of	6,713,186,000
And we have to raise from other sources, including so-called luxuries, only	1,468,706,000

It will not be denied, I assume, that the States upon which the income and excess profits taxes bear most heavily will share in equal proportion the payment of all other taxes, including those upon liquor, luxuries, and the like. And if the committee shall have miscalculated as to the sum to be derived before the President finally assents to prohibition they will share equally or in greater relative proportion in such new forms of taxation as must be devised to make up the deficiency.

PROHIBITION AND PROFITS.

I will not have time to comment upon it at length, but the prohibition question enters into this revenue bill to such an extent as to occasion concern. It was admitted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that it cost more to keep up the revenue establishment under prohibition than it did before prohibitive laws were enacted by certain of the States. Two States were incidentally mentioned in the testimony as being States where no saving to the Treasury Department or in the number of its officials was had because prohibition had been enacted. Representatives of those States were prompt to explain that the increased activity of the revenue officers was due to the fact that large bodies of soldiers had been sent suddenly to the great cantonments in these particular jurisdictions and that the temptation to encourage an illicit traffic had thus been thrust upon them. I refer to this only for economic reasons. If we could transfer the men who have been employed in the investigation of the liquor business to the important work of collecting delinquent taxes and meeting the other requirements of the department much revenue could be saved to the Government. But this recourse was shown to be unsafe. Consider this in connection with the suggestion of the President that there are inequalities in the tax laws "which ought to be remedied."

Whether the present bill, which increases the tax burden everywhere, and particularly where the burdens already fall the heaviest, will operate to remedy the existing inequalities remains to be seen. The able gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. KITCHIN], seems to think that this bill, to which his name will properly be attached for all time, will iron out the inequalities without unduly embarrassing business or injuring any taxpayer. It gave him satisfaction to make this statement in his long and brilliant argument in explanation of the bill. Conceding his mental integrity and his skill as a lawyer, I am not persuaded that his predictions will be ultimately fulfilled. As a Republican and a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I shall vote for the bill rather than risk a further delay in providing that "unquestionable supply of money" which the President in his address to Congress declared to be necessary for purposes of war.

With appropriations already made for the fiscal year 1919 amounting to upward of $29,791,000,000, as shown by the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and verified in full by the Secretary of the Treasury, and with our monthly expenses now exceeding $1,800,000,000, it is no time to withhold support from a measure the early passage of which is demanded by the administration for furthering the war. We are drafting men by the millions to make the awful sacrifice, and we must supply the money to strengthen their arms. As we take them away from their various occupations, unsettling their business and their future prospects, throwing their very lives and the hopes and aspirations of their loved ones into the discard, we must also realize that we are restricting the field of operations from which taxes may be raised and are of necessity compelled to place a greater reliance upon those who are able to continue in the profit-making business. [Applause.]

It is conceded that some safeguards are thrown around small business in this bill, but I can not wholly agree with the gentleman from North Carolina that under the systems of taxation herein proposed smaller concerns may be able to withstand the competition of the greater, or that independent contractors will not eventually be subordinated to those who have the preference of the Government, and who are permitted with Government backing to monopolize the men and material essential to business life. So long as the administration continues, by price fixing, by embargoes, by preferential shipments to favor Government contractors, and by guaranteeing their profits regardless of extravagance and waste or worse, it will not be possible for independent operators to help furnish the sinews of war. [Applause.]

We have ample information now of the effect upon general business of the favoritism thus shown to those who are forthnate enough to utilize the large lump-sum appropriations made by Congress at the behest of the administration, and which are subsequently distributed in enormous amounts under contract conditions which would not be tolerated except in times of war. The committee was unable to make a thorough investigation of Government contracts, as might have been done and as would have been legitimate since the raising of taxes implies that the purpose for which they are raised is worthy and effective, but a Senate committee had been making an investigation of the apparent waste of $640,000,000, which Congress voted to the War Department for aviation, and enough was learned to demonstrate the ease with which Government contracts were framed and the apparent assurance of profits accompanying them. Copies of shipbuilding contracts were brought to the attention of the committee, and it was shown that the same liberal terms were conceded by the Government with respect to cantonments and other large establishments suddenly thrown up by the War Department, and also with respect to housing contracts, about which many independent home builders, whose activities have been checked, have been entering complaint. A sample cost-plus contract, serving to illustrate the Ways and Means Committee's interest in expenditures, is that of the Alabama Drydock & Shipbuilding Co., entered into by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, July 21, 1917. This contract is referred to in printed hearings of the Senate Committee on Commerce. It is only one of many of like tenor. It provides that the contractor, whose profit is guaranteed, shall charge in as a part of the actual cost of construction, apart from all other overhead and labor costs (and seemingly he can pay as high prices for material, and as high prices for labor as he pleases.)

"A proper proportion of taxes of all kinds accrued and paid with respect to the business or property."

It was denied by Lieut. Col. Charles N. Black, formerly of the New York engineering firm of Ford, Bacon & Davis, but now chief of the Procurement Division of the Bureau of Ordnance, and in charge of contracts for his division, that contracts made by the War Department allowing deductions for "taxes of all kinds" included "income taxes, excess-profits taxes," and so forth, or that they would be allowed by the auditors of the department, but it was of interest to the committee, as it should be to the House, that certain contracts had been made which negative this proposition in such explicit terms as to indicate that it was within the range of possibility that allowances had been made to contractors on this account.

COST-PLUS AND TAX-PAID CONTRACTS.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me right there, please?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman and the committee to the fact that this bill provides that no taxpayer shall be permitted to offset any part of his income by the amount of the taxes that he has paid in the preceding year. That being the case, there certainly should be an investigation of the authorities who permitted any contract to be entered into which would permit the thing which the law itself prohibits.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman, and I am very glad he made that point.

Mr. MADDEN. And I think if that condition exists which has just been described by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the sooner the investigation begins the better, because it is not only an outrage but an iniquity that can not be justified. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say, speaking for the committee, that we thoroughly agree with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that such a practice would be an outrage, and when the matter was called to the attention of the committee we summoned before the committee some of the officers, and they denied emphatically that any such practice had ever been followed by the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman from Georgia has spoken, because the matter was one of great concern to the committee, although the committee apparently did not have time to investigate the subject as it would have liked to do. I have referred to contracts that provided that income and excess-profits taxes were not to be included as a credit. For instance, contract No. 144, Pensacola Shipbuilding Co., dated December 4, 1917, page 297, Senate Committee on Commerce hearings, provides:

> The contractor further agrees to pay all income taxes, excess-profits taxes, and all other municipal, State, or Federal taxes which may be assessed or assessable on account of this contract.

It is evident from these isolated cases of comparatively small financial concerns that if profits are guaranteed to a contractor on a cost-plus basis, and he is permitted to charge in his material and labor costs at the highest possible rates, and some or all of his taxes as well, it will automatically relieve the average local competitor from doing any business or paying any taxes at all.

There was a different type of contract and apparently a variety of types in these various departments and bureaus, some of them providing that the contractor shall have an allowance for "all taxes incurred incident to the business or the property." The committee was informed that in a certain instance allowances had been made to one contractor for his excess-profits taxes as well as his income taxes, and that resulted in a brief inquiry, which brought Col. Black down to the committee with this disclaimer, so far as his branch of the Government was concerned.

Mr. MADDEN. Right there, what branch would that be?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Procurement Division of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department. Col. Black had something to do with the earlier stages of the Hog Island business. He was a member of the firm of Ford, Bacon & Davis, of New York, and came into the service along with Mr. Stettinius, the Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. With pleasure.

THE GENTLEMAN FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. CRISP. I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to be fair. Col. Black stated that he was with the purchasing committee of one branch of the Ordnance Department, but that he was also on the general advisory purchasing committee of all the Government activities, and he had never known of a single contract where they had been allowed to present a credit for excess-profits taxes in the contract.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I believe that statement was made by the colonel, and the committee proceeded no further.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman doubtless remembers—and I say this in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]—that Col. Black had with him some blank forms of contract, and I think one that had been actually used, which did provide, just as the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated in the beginning of this subject, that the Government should pay a proper proportion of the taxes.

Mr. CRISP. Did that not have reference to State taxes and municipal taxes, just as everybody else is allowed credit for the payment of any State or municipal tax paid by the corporation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Iowa to give heed to this, so that the statement I now make may be either affirmed or denied, as they see fit. Col. Black, who was a civilian before connecting with the Department of War, did make a general denial that allowances had been made in any contract of which he had knowledge for payment of income and excess-profits taxes. He said the auditors would not permit that. But Col. Black did produce a contract which provided, so far as allowances or reimbursements to a contractor were concerned, as follows: That "a proper proportion of taxes of all kinds accrued and paid with respect to the business or property" should be allowed. I ask the gentleman if I am correct as to that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is perfectly correct. It is on the business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That provision, I may say, was carried in other contracts, in shipbuilding contracts, in this Alabama contract to which I made reference, and in numerous others.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania considers that provision of the contract sufficiently broad not only to include State and county and city taxes but national taxes as well?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would include whatever taxes are incident to the business or property.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. I remember a contract read containing a provision in substance, and maybe literally, just as the gentleman read it. I am not questioning that at all. But the committee was of the opinion, and Col. Black also was, that the allowance for taxes had reference to county and State taxes paid by the corporation, such taxes as are allowable to any and every individual in the conduct of business. But Col. Black further stated that now the Government was not using that blank at all, but was using a contract which absolutely and expressly negatived any proposition or idea that excess profits or income taxes could be deducted.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, as a matter of fact there is no law against taking credit for the taxes paid to the municipalities, counties, and States. That is allowed anyway.

Mr. CRISP. The law allows that anyway, and the contract allows it.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. With pleasure.

Mr. SLOAN. I was not present at the hearing when Col. Black was before the committee; but, as I recall the reading of the hearing, Col. Black did not assume to have knowledge as to what contracts had been made, but simply stated the fact that, of the contracts he knew, none had been made along the line the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested; that no representative of the Government stated that of his own knowledge these contracts had or had not been used.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Col. Black was the only one who appeared before the committee or who was sent for, so far as I know. He was sent for when the question arose as to whether it was the practice of the department to allow contractors to charge in as a credit their income and excess-profits taxes.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION FAILURES.

The saddest case from the viewpoint of national waste is that of the Aircraft Production Board. The House will recall the readiness, even the alacrity, with which it responded to the administration demand in July, 1917, for $640,000,000 to carry out the aircraft program. Members were even cautioned against putting too many interrogatories to the spokesmen of the Committee on Military Affairs, lest secrets might escape and fall into the hands of the enemy. More than a year elapsed, with conflicting reports as to the progress that was being made in aircraft production. We heard that the automobile experts—and they were human, even as they were patriotic—were performing wonders in connection with this vital but more or less secretive work. Congress had no check whatever upon that $640,000,000, and yet it represented a tax of at least $6 upon every man, woman, and child in the United States. I voted for that tax and am disheartened to know that it was wasted. It was as much money taken from the people as was normally necessary to run the Government for a whole year. Much of it was spent in publicity that deceived the people about the progress that was being made. The report of the Senate committee which finally investigated the entire subject was like a thunderbolt from a clear sky. In the hands of those who were permitted to spend it and to make contracts most generous to the contractors, the huge sum passed like water through a sieve. It was a grievous and bitter disappointment to the people of the United States, but, I repeat, Congress had no hand in it except to raise the money by loans and taxes in accordance with the requirements of the administration. A few paragraphs from the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate will tend, I am sure, to confirm the opinion already held by many Members of the legislative body that there should be closer cooperation between the administration and the Congress. What became of our great aviation fund of $640,000,000? Let the Senate committee speak:

The airplane program was largely placed in the control of great automobile and other manufacturers who were ignorant of aeronautical problems.

So much for that. The committee continued:

The mistakes and errors referred to would probably have been largely avoided if the aircraft program had been under the control of one man.

And then—

Organization under the Aircraft Board was unsystematic and ineffective. * * * Contractors, inventors, material men, everyone having business with this arm of the service, and directed from one official to the other, could not well transact their business and secure results with directness and efficiency.

And again:

A number of plane manufacturers, like the Wittemann-Lewis Co., of New Jersey, and in business years prior to the outbreak of the war, have been unable to obtain contracts; while a number of concerns, like the Dayton-Wright Co. and the Standard Co., have been practically organized since the war, and the former was given enormous contracts before its factories were completed.

And later—

The bulk of these royalties was to be paid to the Curtiss and the Wright-Martin companies as compensation for the use of certain patents until each had received $2,000,000. These were to be charged against cost of production and paid by the Government. The agreement was sanctioned by the Department of Justice and approved by the Secretaries of War and the Navy.

But saddest of all, with our $640,000,000 gone glimmering, we were obliged to read—and this Senate report was printed August 22 last only—the following indictment:

In the opinion of the committee a substantial part of the first appropriation was practically wasted.

While much good work has been accomplished, for which due credit should be given, it must nevertheless be admitted that our aeroplane program has, up to the present, presented many aspects of failure. To some of these we call attention:

While an Army of three and one-half million has been raised, the aircraft situation is as follows:

(a) Six hundred and one De Haviland 4s have been embarked for France up to August 1, 1918.

Of these, 67 had reached the front by July 1.

On August 7 a squadron of 18 De Haviland 4s flew over the German lines. Details of its performance have not been received. The character and construction of the De Haviland 4 is further discussed in paragraph (1) and in the body of this report.

(b) We have not a single American-made chasse (or plane of attack) upon the battle front.

(c) We have not a single American-made heavy bombing plane upon the battle front.

(d) We have not developed and put in quantity production a successful chasse or fighting plane.

Six hundred and forty million dollars gone, and nothing but waste, extravagance, and experience. Is it any wonder that the people sometimes complain of the burdens of taxation?

ONE-MAN CONTROL UNDER DISCUSSION.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. It was said following that report that the airplane program was about to be put in the hands of one man, who would have full control of the output?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state whether or not the output has been increased since then?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no information that it has, but I do know that the morning papers report that Secretary Baker has gone to France, and that with him has gone Mr. Ryan, the gentleman whom the President appointed as the one man to look after our aircraft production hereafter.

Mr. MADDEN. But I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that since the appointment of Mr. Ryan as sole managing director of the American airplane program he has been demoted to the position of Second Assistant Secretary of War, which is that of a mere clerk, and that he has no jurisdiction over anything as Second Assistant Secretary of War that somebody else does not supervise. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether as Assistant Secretary of War, without any power except to sign papers delegated to him by superior authority, he is likely to be able to produce any result in the manufacture of airplanes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My information is that Mr. Ryan, placed by the President at the head of the aviation-production service, and who may be Assistant Secretary of War, is the head of a copper company, a man of large affairs and of wide business experience. He comes upon the scene after $640,000,000 of American money raised in taxation from the people has been thrown into the sewer, and the Senate committee reports that after that $640,000,000 had gone a further appropriation of $880,000,000 was demanded to give our aviation program a fighting chance. In this case it will be recalled that after the damage was done the production of aircraft in the United States was put in the hands of a single man; after the horse was stolen the barn door was locked.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman can not forget, can he, that having been put in the hands of a single man, that man has already been demoted by being given a subordinate position as Assistant Secretary of War, in which position he has absolutely no original jurisdiction?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is true—and I accept the gentleman's statement for the purpose of the argument—it shows more plainly than ever that the President of the United States needs the cooperation of Congress, which up to the present time he has not accepted, to observe how these vast sums of the people's money are being expended by those whom he puts in control. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. What assurance have we that this $880,000,000 that we are going to appropriate will not be squandered in like manner?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No one knows but those in control of the administration, those who are managing this war. Congress has not been asked to cooperate with the President or with the department in an inquiry as to why this money was wasted or as to how the new appropriation shall be expended.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROSE. I am much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon the aircraft situation, and I desire to have him state his views as to the exact condition of our airplane service on the battle fields of France, as I have many inquiries from the people I represent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is deplorable. My information is that we have many aviators in France but that they are idle for the want of machines. They are anxious for the service, but are unable to proceed. They are waiting or using such foreign-made machines as can be obtained. The Senate committee report shows that notwithstanding the expenditure of $640,000,000 we have not a single American-made fighting plane in France. I have been advised by some men returning from the battle field that the airplane hold-up was known to Secretary Baker on his first visit to France, and that he took some steps to correct it. I also noticed in the newspapers a few days ago that Gen. Pershing had asked for 25,000 planes.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman know whether or not Mr. Ryan has been displaced from having charge?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know. I only know what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated a moment ago.

WASTE AND EXTRAVAGANCE DENOUNCED.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, that everybody who has an ounce of sense must realize that an Assistant Secretary of War has no original jurisdiction, and that he can not be given original jurisdiction, and that the Secretary of War is the master of the situation; that Mr. Ryan is merely a subordinate, having jurisdiction only to the extent that his superior officer permits him to use it.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not seem to know, and I for one do not know. Whether we have an ounce of sense or not is another question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am accepting the statement of the gentleman from Illinois as to the other matter.

Mr. GARNER. Do you accept the statement of the gentleman from Illinois that if you had an ounce of sense you would know? The gentleman from Illinois said that anybody who had an ounce of sense would know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask how the statement of the gentleman from Illinois would appeal to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. GARNER. I thought it was rather extravagant.

Mr. MADDEN. I said that anybody who had an ounce of sense must realize that an Assistant Secretary of War has no original jurisdiction, that he is merely a subordinate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is willing, I will let the statement of the gentleman from Illinois stand in the RECORD as he made it.

Mr. HARDY. I regarded it merely as an assertion on the part of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And yet it may be true.

Mr. HARDY. It may be. I do not know. I really think in substance it is not true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To stop waste, to prevent extravagance, to checkmate graft and monopoly, could certainly not be interpreted as hindrances to the administration or to the war. On the contrary, the tolerance of waste and extravagance or the grant of special privileges to profiteers, whether they bask in favor of the War Department, or the Food Administration, or the War Industries Board, or any other of the governmental agencies, encourages the unscrupulous, and adds unduly to the sacrifice of life and property which the American people are compelled to make. There should be no place in the Government, especially at this critical stage of our history, for false patriots or those who would willfully turn their Government privilege to personal profit at the expense of those who are making the personal sacrifice of business opportunities, home ties, and life itself.

When the last loan bill was before the House, September 6, 1917, I offered an amendment in a motion to recommit, providing for the appointment of a joint select committee to consist of six Senators and seven Members of the House, the majority being with the dominant party, "to cooperate with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance in the loan and expenditure of money authorized for the national security and defense." This general proposition, which had previously been discussed in both Houses, had met with the opposition of the President, who made public a letter, the contents of which were known to the House. The President's opposition to a committee on expenditures was expressed after the aviation expenditures had commenced, but long before the Senate committee began its investigation. But nevertheless the President opposed the creation of a committee, declaring that it could only serve to embarrass the administration. A point of order was made against the amendment by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and was sustained by the Chair. The proffered cooperation of Congress, therefore, was not considered, and the administration continued to exercise entire control and responsibility with regard to the expenditure of funds. I recall this bit of legislative history because, in view of the enormous contracts that have since been made and of the increasing demand for revenue by loans and taxation, it may have come to pass that the administration will no longer reject a tender by Congress of its willingness to cooperate "in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance." In any event, if opportunity offers I shall again present for the approval of the House an amendment for this purpose.

WHAT THE BILL OMITS TO TAX.

Returning again to the President's statement that the present tax laws are marred "by inequalities which ought to be remedied," and by way of suggestion to the indefatigable gentleman from North Carolina, and to those who think with him that this bill, which bears his name, will be simpler and more equitable and less burdensome, perhaps, than existing law, and for the delectation of the millions of American voters who will be pleased to know they are not included within the provisions of this bill—and I trust no one will attribute the omission to design—I shall briefly refer to some of the industries and activities of American life which the greatest revenue bill of history has seemingly overlooked.

First and foremost, cotton is not taxed. In 1917 the cotton crop consisted of 11,499,930 bales of 500 pounds each, which, at $3 per bale, would have produced in revenue $34,349,790. A proposition was made in committee to tax cotton, but it received scant support.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did everything he could in committee to tax cotton.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I would like the gentleman to say I was making no raid on the farmer.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Did the gentleman make any proposition to tax corn?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; but it was raised as an incident to the proposal to tax cotton.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Has not the gentleman enumerated the second proposition of the two that he failed to get into the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It did seem to me, if the gentleman will permit, that inasmuch as we were proposing to tax almost everything else in the country, and cotton was fairly profitable during the war, it might help.

Mr. GARNER. I wish to corroborate the gentleman from Georgia, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did make a persistent and insistent effort to tax cotton.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He made a good fight. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Yes; he made a good fight. He made a good fight on both propositions that he has discussed. I hold in my hand the bill, and outside of these two propositions is there anything in the bill itself which is not the creature of the gentleman's brain as much as the brain of any member of the committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have a little list. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield to my cotton friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania make an effort to tax steel or coal in connection with cotton?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought indirectly they were very heavily taxed. I thought they paid a very large proportion of the taxes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that all the northern members of the committee refused to tax cotton?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas that it would be unparliamentary to reveal the secrets of the committee. I will tell the gentleman in confidence. [Laughter.]

COTTON EXPERTS ON THE JOB.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield to my enthusiastic cotton friend from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to get the figures that the gentleman gave as to cotton in the first place.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The figures that I gave were 11,499,930 bales. Possibly the gentleman from Alabama may be able to correct those figures. I regard him as a cotton expert.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman has given them about right, speaking of the cotton crop of last year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is correct. I am confirmed by high authority, and being so confirmed I say that if the committee had seen its duty as I thought I saw it on that amount of cotton at $3 a bale, which would have been a reasonable tax, not onerous or burdensome, we would have raised over $34,000,000; but the committee in its wisdom decided that it would be well to leave cotton out.

Mr. HARDY. Has the gentleman the figures showing the amount of the corn crop?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; but it was very heavy.

Mr. HARDY. One cent a bushel tax——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The same Members who stood by cotton also stood by corn.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman did not propose to tax corn?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would have been willing to consider it in our extremity.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. The gentleman has stated in reply to one question that steel is heavily taxed. What is the tax?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Raw steel; I do not know that there is any tax on it.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. On manufactured steel?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On nearly every article produced from raw steel.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman name one except luxuries that happen to have a little steel in them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman has given the answer. Include automobiles.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. And those things that have cotton in them are taxed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman has come to the rescue of cotton, because it is in the same boat with grain. The gentleman will not deny that the steel industry is heavily taxed and that everyone who makes anything out of steel is heavily taxed. The gentleman can not deny the figures given a moment ago that in those States where steel figures largely in industrial life—Pennsylvania, New York, and Illinois—one-half of all the corporation and income tax, which some other people avoid, is paid.

CORN AND COTTON IN THE SAME BOAT.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I agree that corn is in the same boat, as the gentleman said, with cotton; and so is wheat and so is oats—the things we produce in my district. If the gentleman wants to tax cotton and agricultural products, why does he not move to tax the products that grow on the land in my district, too [applause], the only agricultural products we grow in this country; put a tax on those.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is consistent on that proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not a fact that the price of wheat is fixed by the Government?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. And also the price of steel; so that they are not enjoying the competitive market that cotton enjoys?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] that corn is in the same category with cotton. Every means of consumption of corn is controlled by the Government. The price of cattle, the price of hogs, and all the uses to which corn is put are controlled by the Government and the price fixed, and that is not true of cotton. Cotton has been absolutely immune from our taxing, and the products of cotton are immune from the control of price. That is decidedly different from the case of corn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let that statement stand in the RECORD.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman this, then: Would not the remedy be for the Government to fix the price of cotton, if he wants to put it in the same boat with agricultural products, instead of taxing it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It would be just as good to fix the price on wool.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the farmers' friends are at work. If we get their think tanks going something may result.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to suggest, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], that the price-controlling power has fixed the price of cattle and hogs and meat, but it has neglected to fix the price or in any way control the selling value of cotton products.

Mr. STEENERSON. And wool.

Mr. SLOAN. And in the absence of the authorities fixing the price it leaves our only remedy to put a burden on cotton so that it may stand in similar status with corn—to tax it.

PRICE OF COTTON NOT FIXED YET.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Answering the gentleman's suggestion, I will say, merely by way of information to the House and all those who are interested in this very important question, that the President of the United States, so far as the newspapers give us information, has for a long time—lo, a full year, at least—been considering the question of fixing the price of cotton, but that up to the present time, although there have been strong influences on both sides of the question, the price of cotton has not been fixed. It is reported from day to day that something may be done in that direction and the market fluctuates.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Just one other point——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I am quite satisfied that the gentlemen who represent the cotton belt have sufficient influence at the present time, even though war has laid its heavy hand upon us, to hold up the fixing of the price of cotton if it should be essential to the industry.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, again, if the price was fixed, perhaps the cotton planter would not be so well satisfied, and, therefore, it might be unwise for the President to enter this price-fixing field. The farmer who raises grain, whose price was fixed by the President, has not been enthusiastic about it; but still the gentleman who represents grain, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], contends that his man should not be touched, and the gentleman who raises cotton, my friend from Texas [Mr. HARDY], contends his man should not be touched, and those of us who are consumers—we who are paying more for grain and grain products than ever and higher prices for cotton goods than ever—get the hot end of the poker.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman have any recollection of the President having within the last day or two telegraphed to some convention or meeting of cotton dealers or growers——

Mr. SANFORD. In Georgia.

Mr. MADDEN. That they need not be disturbed about the administration fixing any regulation that will disturb the present attitude of the Government toward cotton?

SENATORIAL CONTEST IN GEORGIA.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, I will venture this far. A great senatorial contest is going on in Georgia now, and I would not be a particle surprised if some letter of some kind or other had gone from the President to assuage the situation.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. CRISP. I can state to the gentleman that according to the press there was a telegram from the President to Mr. Harris in Georgia that the War Industries Board was investigating with a view of stabilizing the price of cotton. Now, what "stabilizing" means unless it means fixing the price I can not comprehend. Now, if the gentleman will permit me while I am on the floor——

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt——

Mr. CRISP. I would really rather leave this controversy between you gentlemen, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that steel used in manufacture was taxed, the inference being that cotton was immune. All cotton used in any manufactured goods, if used as luxuries, is taxed. There is no tax whatever on Pennsylvania anthracite coal I have heard of. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Furthermore, there is no tax on wool, and I have not heard anybody proposing to tax wool, except its manufacture. I also want to say to the gentleman I come from the South and my people are just as loyal and as patriotic to this Government as any section on earth, and if it becomes necessary they are not only willing to pay taxes on cotton, but are willing to give all to the Government. [Applause.] But they do not believe that a just Government would practice any such invidious distinction and tax one agricultural product, leaving the others immune. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I highly respect the gentleman from Georgia. He is learned, forceful, and patriotic. He has made a statement, however, upon which I wish to comment. He tacitly admits that the President has forwarded to William J. Harris in Georgia a telegram on the cotton situation. This same Mr. Harris is favored by the President in his candidacy for the Senate in the coming election, and that against a sitting Senator. Proposition No. 2: The gentleman has stated what, I believe, comes from his heart—that the people whom he represents would loyally pay if they felt called upon to pay. I have been of the opinion that if they were included in this great tax scheme they would pay loyally. I offered the suggestion that their products might pay the tax along with those of others who are obliged to pay.

A COINCIDENCE ABOUT REPRESENTATION.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. GARNER. In order that the record may be clear, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact in his criticism of the administration for failing to fix the price of cotton while fixing the price of wheat—or the legislative branch of the Government who did that—that the price-fixing board, the War Industries Board, is composed, I believe, of 17 men. Out of those 17, 1 comes from a cotton-growing State. Now, it does seem like the cotton-growing States could not have such an overbearing influence with 17 men, only 1 of whom comes from such a State. They have gone so far, I will say to the gentleman, as to fix the price on linters and to fix the price on cotton seed, on cottonseed meal, and other products, but they have not so far fixed the price on cotton, and, if the gentleman will allow me to express my individual opinion, I think it very unwise to go into the fixing of the price of cotton, although I have very little in my district.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So long as the gentleman has made that statement and has given expression to the thought that the cotton men are not getting a fair deal in the War Industries Board, having only 1 representative among 17, may I be permitted to observe that having sat now these three months on the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives framing a great tax bill which the President indicated should be an equitable bill, I have discovered that but 2 men on that committee of 23 are from big cities, where the people are not producers of foodstuffs, but consumers exclusively. A strange sort of coincidence, is it not?

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I want to get the gentleman's views on this question now that it has been raised. I think he has not clearly expressed himself. The price of certain foodstuffs has been fixed. Of course, that was for the benefit of the consumer. Now, the price of cotton has not been fixed, and my friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] suggests as a remedy for the omission on the part of the Government that instead of fixing the price on cotton in lieu of that we put a tax on it. Now, in fixing the price on those things where the price has been fixed the purpose has been to keep down the price to the consumer. But a tax on cotton would tend to increase the price to the consumer. That is a remedy offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN]. [Applause.] Now, does the gentleman agree that would be a remedy for the failure of the Government to fix the price on cotton?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not inclined to enter this dispute between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Nebraska. They are both experts in the matters about which they speak. But I am willing, as a consuming Representative of an all-consuming constituency, to say that so far as I have observed the price fixing to date, the man who is producing is guaranteed the price, but the man who is consuming pays a higher price than he ever did before in his life.

Mr. GARNER. And for that reason you insist that the Government ought to fix the price of cotton?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not insisted on that at all.

Mr. GARNER. You were criticizing and saying that the southern Senators, and so on, had sufficient influence to keep it from being done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said the price of cotton had not been fixed. I was not advocating it. I want the gentleman to know that I am as friendly to the cotton planter as I am to the farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Then deliver us from our friends! "Beware of Greeks bearing gifts."

SUPPLY AND DEMAND V. PRICE FIXING.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to say that if our products are burdened in one way by the administration, I think the products in other sections should be burdened, if not by the administration, by Congress, and I ask the gentleman what he thinks about fixing the price of the wool of the Northwest, clothing material, and not fixing the price of cotton?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am inclined to say to the gentleman, as I said to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], that this is a quarrel between gentlemen who are experts. My own judgment is that if we had less price fixing and a little better observance of the law of supply and demand we would all be better off and better satisfied. [Applause.]

And now to our mutton:

Second, consumption taxes are not included in this bill. On such commodities as tea, coffee, and sugar they might be levied at the customhouse without affront to the consumer, but that suggestion also was not approved in committee. It has been estimated that if 2 cents per pound were levied upon coffee as it comes into the country over $26,000,000 of revenue would be raised. A 10-cent per pound levy on tea brought into the United States would produce over $10,000,000. A 1-cent per pound levy on sugar would produce over $84,000,000 of revenue. Is it possible these duties, so levied and publicly understood, would be instrumental in advancing the price of sugar to the consumer? Or would the imposition of this tax upon the importer not tend to regulate the price of this commodity in the United States and prevent the outrageous profiteering that has ensued under Government control between the importer and the badly handicapped consumer? But it was deemed unwise, perhaps impolitic, to impose these taxes.

PROFITEERING AND WASTE IN FOOD SUPPLIES.

Now, as to that sugar situation, let me say this——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has not the gentleman given his figures wrong?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am using only 1 cent a pound.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The importation last year was 1,500,000,000 pounds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The figures given to me by an expert were 8,464,488,163 consumption in 1917.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is speaking of consumption and not of imports.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood that he was speaking of the duty. I thought he put sugar in the same category as tea and coffee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We can illustrate this in a short way. Mr. Hoover, the Food Administrator, issues his edict and the hotel man very patriotically observes it. He puts up the high sign of patriotism with the coat of arms of the United States on it and says, "Food will win the war. We follow the Food Administration." When you sit down at the table you find you are given two lumps of sugar for your cup of coffee or you are given a little spoonful of sugar in a small envelope. You say to the waiter, "May I have another lump of sugar? You are asking 25 cents for this cup of coffee." But the waiter says, "We are very patriotic, sir; we must follow the advice of the Food Administrator and can give you but two lumps." And then he adds, in confidence, "It is very queer, sir, for we are paying no more for sugar now than we did before the war and we buy less of it; but we must obey the Food Administrator. We are very patriotic, sir."

If this illustration does not suffice, let me recur to grain, upon which the price has been fixed. If the housewife seeks to obtain some wheat flour to make bread that will be suitable for the diet of the growing child, she is blandly told to buy substitutes, and these coarser ingredients are forced upon her at retail prices out of all proportion to their comparative value—higher, perhaps, than wheat itself. Mr. Hoover has a licensing system, and all that, and rounds up a few gentle malefactors once in a while, but the retail price of breadstuffs does not come down, and he is unable to prevent the profiteering that makes a martyr of the average consumer who tries to live up to his rules and limitations. We have given a pretty free hand to the so-called Grain Corporation also, and there is good reason to believe that we have permitted the mixing of flour to an extent that may lead to scandal. So that somewhere between the producer and consumer, or the Food Administrator and the people who pay the increased price for food supplies, whether they be bread or sugar, there is profiteering, and we do not control it in this bill.

It is rather curious, too, that for lack of transportation or by reason of food embargoes potatoes should be allowed to rot in Florida and fruit should go to waste, when the northern market supply is limited and retail prices are soaring. Or may we apply this illustration to products in other sections of the country that are not shipped to market for similar reasons, thus encouraging waste on the one hand and high prices on the other? This sort of thing may be tolerated while the people are obtaining high wages and high returns for their products, but it certainly can not last forever.

SUGAR EXPERTS TAKE A HAND.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did I understand you to say that we are not paying now any more for sugar than we were paying before the war?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think no more substantially.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You mean before the United States entered the war, or before the great war in Europe began?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before we entered the war.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Sugar sold here, to my recollection, at 8 pounds to the dollar.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the dealer pays substantially no more for his supplies now than he did before the war. The consumer pays more.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Here is a gentleman representing a sugar district, and he can say that that is a mistake.

Mr. MARTIN rose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and knows all about sugar. I would be very glad to have his statement.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say to the gentleman that the price of refined sugar has been raised to 9 cents a pound at seaboard refineries. This does not affect stocks on hand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What was the price before the war began?

Mr. MARTIN. The price was about 5 cents a pound.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was before the European war?

Mr. MARTIN. It has been going up ever since the war started, but not as rapidly as other commodities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana, as a sugar expert, this question: Is there any difference between the price of sugar now and the price in 1916?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is it?

Mr. MARTIN. It is now about 25 per cent more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much per pound would that be?

Mr. MARTIN. A cent and a half or two cents a pound.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think that that increase in the price of sugar would warrant those who dispense sugar in a hotel, for instance, charging 25 cents for a cup of coffee instead of 10 cents, because the price of sugar has gone up?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman's position amount to this—and I agree with the gentleman as to that—that the right place to begin on the saving of sugar would be as to the price at which it should be sold to the consumer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the prices would regulate themselves if they were allowed to, because if they got too high the people would not buy, and then the price would come down.

Mr. HARDY. If we fix prices at all, ought it not to be at the point where the commodity goes to the consumer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Perhaps so.

SOME OTHER TAXABLES UNTOUCHED.

And then it was suggested in committee that the heavy tax on incomes and corporations which, in the last analysis is a tax on business and industry, could be relieved somewhat by a moderate tax on gross sales. It was estimated that $1,000,000,000 could be raised in this manner, and that such a tax known to the consumer would prevent the insolent profiteering by those who pretended to cover the taxes in the retail price. "Administrative difficulties" killed the gross-sales suggestion.

Neither was a tax upon bank checks, estimated to raise $30,000,000, favorably considered. That would not have been a popular tax.

A tax on newspaper advertising and on billboards was also proposed. The tax on advertising would not have been so much against the newspapers as against those who paid for the advertising, but the newspaper situation is a delicate one. And this bill carries no tax upon advertising.

During the committee's deliberations a tax upon dogs was suggested. It was claimed by those engaged in the sheep industry that the raising of mutton and wool must necessarily be limited so long as the prowling dog is permitted to devastate the flock. Statisticians estimated that a $1 tax upon dogs would not only raise $10,000,000 of revenue but would greatly encourage an essential war industry and save food for humans. But the dog was too popular to permit of this tax innovation.

Another field which the Ways and Means Committee did not enter was that relating to the greater number of people in the United States whose net incomes are less than $2,000 in the case of married men and $1,000 in the case of single men. It must be admitted that this is a dangerous field to enter from the political as well as from the economic point of view, but Great Britain, from which the Treasury Department has derived much inspiration in the matter of taxation, imposes a tax upon incomes as low as $600 per annum, while during the Civil War a percentage tax was paid upon such incomes. We hear a great deal now about high wages paid in shipyards, in manufacturing establishments, upon the farms, and in the cotton fields. And it is estimated that there are at least 17,000,000 persons in the United States, single men and single women included, engaged in gainful occupations, who at so low a rate as $5 each would contribute an annual revenue of $85,000,000. But this bill does not include these 17,000,000 in the taxable class. They may be included amongst those who pay the high cost of living and whose incomes are necessarily reduced thereby, but that is a tribute to the profiteer; it is not an aid to the Government conducting the war.

THE PRESIDENT REJECTED COOPERATION.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. While the gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the profiteers I would like to be permitted to ask him a question, if he will allow it. Was any consideration given by the committee during its deliberations to the question of the propriety and advisability and necessity of a committee of Congress inquiring into the extravagant expenditures made by the various departments as the result of this profiteering?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. "The gentleman from Pennsylvania" offered an amendment to the bill providing for the creation of a committee on expenditures to cooperate with the President and the departments "to prevent waste and extravagance" and to facilitate the financial business connected with the war. But the committed voted that down.

Need it be said that the tariff was suggested in these three months' deliberation? The gentleman from Michigan, the ranking Republican on the committee [Mr. FORDNEY], was very faithful in attendance. He raised the question and argued that the Underwood tariff law had failed to produce sufficient revenue to run the country prior to the war. He admitted that the war itself, in lieu of a tariff, had given the United States a temporary kind of protection, but he insisted that foreign goods that ought to pay duty were coming in free, and that hundreds of millions could be raised by the party in power to relieve the burden of direct taxes if a reasonable tariff law should be passed. But his suggestion got no further than the speech of the gentleman from Michigan, except that a committee, bipartisan to be sure, was appointed to investigate and report. The chairman of that committee was the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, and up to date he has not assembled the committee nor has there been a report. Nor is it highly probable that there will be one in time to be of service in the consideration of this bill. [Laughter.]

Having referred to some sources of taxation that might have been tapped by the committee, but which are not included in the bill, I shall leave this subject, with the general statement that a perusal of the bill will show that the tax line is very tightly drawn as between production of raw material and the manufacture or fabrication thereof. The burden of taxation falls upon those who manufacture, manipulate, or consume the products of the sea, the soil, or the air, or who engage in the marketing or distribution thereof. This, in large measure, may account for the concentration of taxes where industry, commerce, and finance are most in evidence.

TAX OVERSIGHT DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

Before closing, I again recur to the propriety of justice and uniformity in the matter of taxation. The expenses of the war should be borne in fair proportion by every citizen according to his ability to pay. There should be no profiteering and no favoritism. [Applause.] The taxpayer, upon whom the burden falls heaviest, is still preferred above him who falls in the trenches. If life is worth anything, taxes or no taxes, it is better than dissolution, and, as President Wilson said, "We need not be afraid to tax them, if we lay taxes justly." This was the spirit of the Civil War. Congress and the people were a long time coming to it, but they finally assumed their every responsibility. The chairman of this committee has sounded his warning against the hoarding of loans and has given the House his estimate of annual interest charges if taxes are not paid in fair proportion to the loans issued. As we must tax, the question is to so tax as to be fair to everybody. I am not sure this problem has been solved by the pending bill. I doubt whether it lays taxes justly upon all the people, as President Wilson indicated in his address they should be levied. I question whether that profiteering of which the President said there was ample evidence, and which the Secretary of the Treasury in his fighting letter of June 5 to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means said should be curtailed, even if "the Government should take back in taxes all profits above a reasonable reward," has been checked by this bill.

The bill may raise the $8,000,000,000 which the administration demands, but it is still too complicated, too subject to interpretation by administrative officials, to enable anyone to predict whether the expectation of the President and his Secretary of the Treasury, in the matter of profiteering, will be fulfilled.

My personal belief is that a wise cooperative supervision of expenditures by a congressional committee would help the administration to solve this problem and to prevent waste and extravagance of the taxes raised. [Applause.] But the President thus far has set his face against this plan, although it was adopted in a more aggravated form during the Civil War and served a useful purpose. That it would be prudent and helpful in our present great emergency is emphasized by the growing demands upon the Treasury. The $8,000,000,000 we are now raising, stupendous sum that it is, will be sufficient, as demands are now pressing upon the Treasury, to meet expenditures for the short period of four months only. Under these conditions, whether congressional cooperation is welcomed or not, our faith in the ultimate triumph of our cause must continue unabated.

THAD STEVENS AND KITCHIN COMPARED.

A chapter from the history of the Civil War will not at this time, I trust, be amiss. It is 50 years since Thaddeus Stevens, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and leader of the House of Representatives, died as he wished, "like Nicanor, in harness." An intense partisan but an able statesman, the great Pennsylvanian was fearless in dealing with the problems that confronted the Nation. He chided the Army for its alleged shortcomings when he thought it deserved it. He attacked privilege wherever it appeared, disputed with Cabinet officers who seemed to overstep their authority, and, upon occasion, disagreed with the immortal Lincoln. When Lincoln died he instituted impeachment proceedings against Andrew Johnson, who succeeded to the Presidency. All this and more in his stormy legislative career grew out of his insistence upon the observance of the Constitution by those who were sworn to uphold and defend it. It fell to him and the committee over which he presided to raise the money to prosecute the war, and as that money came from the people, who, under the Constitution, were entitled through their lawfully chosen Representatives to a voice in its direction, he did not hesitate to take to task the high or the low, whether in uniform or civilian clothes, who overstepped the limitations set by the Constitution, or who forgot that the will of the people in matters of war and finance is expressed through the Congress of the United States. The Great Commoner occupied the same relation to the Civil War that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] does to our war with Germany—except that then the committee over which he presided and which raised the revenue was also the Appropriation Committee, which it is not to-day. His tremendous task involved the raising in four years of nearly $4,000,000,000, a sum so great that Mr. McCall, his biographer, a former distinguished Member of this House, sets it in towering contrast with "the aggregate amount raised by loans and taxation by the French people during the wars of the Consulate and Empire, which did not greatly exceed $2,000,000,000." Stevens, like KITCHIN, did not believe too great a proportion of the war cost should be raised by loans, but, says McCall, "after Congress realized that the war was a war of tremendous magnitude" Stevens and his associates on Ways and Means determined upon their policy as to loans and taxes, and "measure followed measure * * * with a rapidity that proved their fixed determination of carrying it out."

And when they finally got down to business—

> The same Members who had opposed the taxes upon tea, coffee, and sugar in July were willing in December to pass almost without debate a further increase of several millions in these taxes. An internal-revenue bill was passed which, with subsequent amendments, covered almost the entire field of industry and consumption.

And I want to say right there, parenthetically, that it covered many things which our committee has left out, and many things that have been discussed on the floor since this debate began. I read further:

> These measures were interesting, not so much from any principle of taxation which they illustrated, as from the ingenuity of Stevens and his colleagues in discerning and exhausting almost every source of revenue. The great burden of taxes fell upon malt and spirituous liquors. Stamps were required upon the most minute as well as the most important transactions of business. The butcher was required to pay a license fee, and in addition a certain sum for every beef or hog or sheep that he killed. The dealer who sold him the animals he slaughtered had also to pay a tax. A license was required for almost every imaginable calling and trade. Horse dealers and peddlers, jugglers and lawyers, doctors and soapmakers, had each to contribute a fixed sum to the Government. The dentist was required to pay $10 before he could pull a tooth, and the eating-house keeper a like sum before he could sell a meal. The manufacturer was compelled to pay a license fee and in addition a specific or an ad valorem tax upon the goods he made. A comprehensive idea of the great variety of pursuits and avocations which were followed in this country in 1862 can be gained by reading the internal-revenue law. If, after paying the multitude of general and special taxes, one was fortunate enough to have more than $600 of annual income left he was asked to pay 3 per cent to the Government, and if the surplus amounted to $10,000, 10 per cent. At the end of the war the internal taxes were producing revenue at the rate of more than $300,000,000 a year. The tariff duties were revised and increased in number and amount until they annually brought to the Treasury $180,000,000.

The biographer adds—

> The achievement not only stands without a parallel, but it stands unapproached.

Mr. Chairman, may I say in conclusion that the great financial problems of the Civil War, involving $4,000,000,000 in four years, are small indeed compared with those which now confront the country when we must raise $8,000,000,000 for four months, but this simple recital of the manner in which they were met carries a lesson which may be of value to the present generation and to the administration conducting the war. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield 8 or 10 minutes to one other gentleman, unless it is too late.

Mr. KITCHIN. Go ahead.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, after my distinguished colleague [Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania] has so intelligently and clearly explained the revenue bill, it gives me pleasure to state that the citizens of Pennsylvania will do their part in meeting the requirements of the measure, but not any more so than the citizens of the land of cotton or the land of coal and of iron. [Applause.]

Friends, war is the most expensive rôle in which a nation can be involved. Its horrors and devastations test the strength, the patriotism, and the morals of its citizens. Upon the declaration of war it becomes the unbounded duty of every subject to make such sacrifices as the Government may demand of him, in order to preserve the honor and the integrity of the country of which he is a part.

The administration has asked Congress to levy a tax of $8,000,000,000 upon the people as a war budget for 1919. I will support the bill because we are at war; if at peace, I would oppose all revenue bills that did not contain a high protective tariff clause. [Applause.] I believe that a protective tariff is most essential for the prosperity and growth of our Republic, and by these principles our resources were developed to that extent that our wealth, perhaps, is greater than that of any other nation.

But this is not a Republican administration; it is for the party in power to raise the revenue in accordance with its philosophy of taxation.

The issue of winning the war is the supreme one of the hour, and every American patriot, regardless of his political views, will sustain the war policies of the Government and meet the urgency of the times with unquestionable loyalty. We will have to make a great many more sacrifices before the Kaiser raises his flag of truce or the tree of liberty extends its branches over the civilized world to let fall its ripened fruits of democracy. We will be called upon to make more sacrifices before the Bolsheviki is silenced or the Siberian peasant breathes the breath of liberty. We will make more sacrifices before our allies consecrate upon their political altars the birth of a new democracy.

These things must be before we sheathe the sword or before victory is complete for America. Sometimes I think that the prophecy of Tom Moore, the words he placed in the mouth of the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, may yet come true through the world's war of carnage:

From the lips of truth one mighty breath
Shall, like the whirlwind, scatter in its breeze
The whole dark pile of human mockeries,
Then shall the reign of mind commence on earth.

The $8,000,000,000 of taxes will be paid by the American people with a war spirit and with but one thought in mind: Victory for America.

On motion of Mr. GARNER the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BOOHER for four days, on account of the death of his brother.

PUBLIC-SERVICE FRANCHISES, PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 274).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 38 of the act approved March 2, 1917 (39 Stat., 951), entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of six franchises granted by the Public Service Commission, Porto Rico. The copies of the franchises inclosed are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War transmitting them to me.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 9 September, 1918.

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION (S. DOC. NO. 275).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which with the accompanying documents was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress report of the Director General of Railroads of the work of the United States Railroad Administration for the first seven months of its existence ended July 31, 1918.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 9 September, 1918.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 10, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting part 2 of the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Lighthouses for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, transmitting an estimate in the sum of $9,600 supplemental to the appropriation of $380,000 for salaries, Lighthouse Service, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1271); to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

The bill (H. R. 11570) granting an increase of pension to James C. Burwell; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 11860) granting a pension to Margaret Holly; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 12110) granting an increase of pension to Alexander B. Davis; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 12111) granting an increase of pension to Henry Parrish; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON: Resolution (H. Res. 429) requesting the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish the House of Representatives with certain reports or recommendations touching the price of wheat; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. KNUTSON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 328) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any packing, canning, or refrigerating plant or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor; to the Committee on Agriculture.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARNHART: A bill (H. R. 12906) granting a pension to Andrew J. Bierce; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD: A bill (H. R. 12907) for the relief of Charles W. Johnson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12908) for the relief of Zachary T. Heal; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 12909) granting an increase of pension to John T. Martin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Papers accompanying H. R. 12901, granting an increase of pension to Louis Sickenberger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FESS: Petition of the Woman's Civic League, Harveysburg, Ohio, for war-time prohibition; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. KAHN: Petition of many citizens and residents of Los Angeles, Cal., and vicinity, urging the passage of H. R. 5407, permitting osteopaths to enter the Medical Reserve Corps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RUBEY: Petitions of Mrs. J. S. Smotherman, Sunday school temperance superintendent for Wright County, Mo., and many other members of Wright County Sunday schools, urging immediate national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SNYDER: Petition of the Rome (N. Y.) License League against change in the existing liquor laws of the United States; also, a petition of various persons residents of Little Falls, N. Y., favoring prohibition of the liquor traffic during the period of the war and demobilization; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TAGUE: Telegrams from certain reputable business concerns in Boston protesting against the Gore amendment to House bill 11945; to the Committee on Agriculture.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 10, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, for the onward march of civilization apparent everywhere in the intellectual, moral, and spiritual life of men, which promises the final victory of good over evil in spite of the cruel war thrust on the civilized nations of the world by the barbaric hosts who would check advancing civilization and turn the world into a veritable hell.

Inspire us as individuals and as a Nation to press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, to preside as Speaker pro tempore to-morrow.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, for the day, on account of illness; and

To Mr. MILLER of Washington, for to-morrow, September 11, on account of delivering an address in Massachusetts.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing the President to establish zones in which intoxicating liquors may not be sold, manufactured, or distributed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3439. An act for the relief of certain homestead and desert-land entrymen;

S. 3646. An act to grant rights of way over Government lands for reservoir purposes for the conservation and storage of water to be used by the city of San Diego, Cal., and adjacent communities; and

S. 3522. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following title were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3439. An act for the relief of certain homestead and desert-land entrymen, to the Committee on Public Lands; and

S. 3522. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 43 ayes and 2 noes.

Mr. FOSTER and Mr. WALSH made the point of order that no quorum was present.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 244, answered "present" 2, not voting 184, as follows:

YEAS—244.

So the motion of Mr. KITCHIN was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. OLNEY with Mr. WARD.

Mr. BOOHER with Miss RANKIN.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON of Texas with Mr. FARR.

Mr. EAGAN with Mr. PARKER of New York.

Mr. GALLIVAN with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BROWNING.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana with Mr. MUDD.

Mr. PADGETT with Mr. HICKS.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. FOSS.

Mr. VINSON with Mr. MOTT.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. GRAY of New Jersey.

Mr. HOWARD with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. TINKHAM.

Mr. GALLAGHER with Mr. LUFKIN.
Mr. SABATH with Mr. LEHLBACH.
Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas with Mr. WINSLOW.
Mr. DOOLITTLE with Mr. SIEGEL.
Mr. LEA of California with Mr. SANFORD.

Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. GOODALL.
Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. NELSON.
Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts.
Mr. BELL with Mr. GOULD.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise at this time to discuss at any length the revenue bill, for I agree that it is the duty of every Member of the House to make as good a bill as possible, and upon the final vote to vote for the bill, which I shall do. I wish to speak for a moment or two, however, upon the bill so far as it relates to the conduct of the war.

Maine had an election yesterday—a sort of nonpartisan affair. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] We had our primaries in June. They were very quiet. There were no fights. Each political party nominated its candidates without any opposition. The Republican State committee met and agreed, so far as the Republicans were concerned, that they would not have any speaking campaign. The Democrats said nothing, but immediately commenced a speaking campaign throughout the State, in every school district, in every schoolhouse, from every automobile that they could hire or borrow. Their candidate for governor, with candidates for Congress, with the candidates for every office upon the Democratic ticket, went into their speaking campaign. Upon the part of the Democratic Party in Maine it was the most unfair campaign ever conducted—an attempt to prejudice the governor and to prejudice every Member of Congress and every man who was running for office upon the Republican ticket. I need not go into the issues of the campaign—issues of prejudice, not against the governor of Maine because of anything done by his administration, because it was admitted that it had been a good administration, the best so far as business was concerned, in Maine; not on the ground that any Member of this House or of the Senate had been unpatriotic, that they had not stood by the administration, because it was admitted everywhere that they had; but outside of prejudice and local fights here and there, every candidate from the smallest, most insignificant office on the Democratic ticket made the issue that a vote against the Democratic candidate was a vote against the administration and in favor of Germany. Let me show you just a moment about that campaign. The Democratic candidate for United States Senator a few days before the election said:

> I only ask you to send to Wilson your vote of confidence in him and in his splendid leadership. Do not by your vote in September send any confidence to Germany. Defeat the Huns and the governor.

The following was scattered all over the State, put in all of the Democratic newspapers and in editorials:

> SUPPORT THE ADMINISTRATION—DISCOURAGE GERMANY.
> Our opponents, the Germans, are very quick and "cute" about catching onto little things by which to encourage their people in time of discouragement and distress, like the present. Don't you suppose that the German authorities and newspapers, if the Democrats get the worst of it in the congressional elections this fall by the Republicans, in this country, will at once proclaim the news from the housetops that the American administration, which has been conducting the war so vigorously against Germany, has not been backed by the United States, but on the contrary has been rebuked, and that, if the Germans will only hold on a few months longer, America may be out of the war entirely, as evidenced by the result of the election?
> Of course they will do just that thing, and thus a Republican victory in the election this fall would probably mean months longer of war, bloodshed, and terrible sacrifice and agony.

The fight, outside of the governorship, centered in the second congressional district of Maine, the seat now occupied by my colleague [Mr. WHITE]. [Applause on the Republican side.] A very unfair campaign was carried on against Mr. WHITE, who had supported the administration and administration measures, who had a clean record everywhere, and against whom there could be no fault found. He was opposed by Mr. McGILLICUDDY, who two years ago was left at home by the people of the district that once sent to this Congress William P. Frye and Nelson Dingley. Mr. McGILLICUDDY came before the people again for election, basing his claim upon the statement that a vote for Congressman WHITE would be a vote for the Kaiser. His record in Congress had been a record against every measure of preparedness while he was here, and my colleague [Mr. WHITE] put his record against that of Mr. McGILLICUDDY. The governor of my State, in speaking at Lewiston the last night of the campaign, said:

> I didn't come over here on my own account altogether. I came to urge the people of this district to return to Congress my friend, Congressman WALLACE H. WHITE, a clean, faithful, efficient, honest man, every inch a gentleman, for whom none of you will ever feel the necessity of apologizing to anyone for having sent to Washington. [Great applause.] I want to call your attention to the fact that you have seen no one from Washington here urging the election of his opponent. Two years ago there were Cabinet officials here and prominent Democrats of national reputation trying to help Mr. WHITE'S political opponent. They are not here to-day. This is a most significant fact. No one in Washington urges Mr. WHITE'S defeat, and for good reasons. They know his record there. They know how he stands, together with the other Maine Representatives and Senators, for the winning of the war. Mr. WHITE is loyal, as are all the other men from Maine. You have reason to be proud of him and of them. What reason is there for changing your Representative in Congress from this district? I have heard of none. No one in Washington has a reason to advance, because there is none, and they know it.

At that meeting my colleague [Mr. WHITE] said:

> He [Mr. McGILLICUDDY] says that my election will please the Kaiser and that his election will be a blow to the Kaiser. To be honest about it, I don't believe the Kaiser ever heard of either Mr. McGILLICUDDY or myself, or is ever likely to.
> [Laughter.]
> But if he has heard of Mr. McGILLICUDDY it was because he helped the Kaiser keep this country from preparing itself to fight when it ought to have been preparing, as every man with any vision at all should have seen.

I want now to call your attention, in closing, to the following telegram sent by Senator FERNALD:

> Republicans elect governor, Senator, four Congressmen. Milliken's majority, 8,000; FERNALD'S, 12,000; WHITE'S, 2,000. Vote light, but Republican gains in every county.
> (Signed) BERT M. FERNALD.

[Great applause.]

Mr. Chairman, two years ago Mr. WHITE'S majority was 537, now it is 2,000. I wish to say, in closing, that great credit is to be given to the President of the United States for not interfering in the Maine elections. There has been great pressure brought upon the President. He has refused to send into Maine letters advocating the election of Mr. McGILLICUDDY in the second district.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The President tried his interference in Michigan and found it failed. Therefore he let Maine alone.

Mr. HERSEY. Whatever the reason was, I think the President understands now that the people of this country are going to take care of their own elections from now on, and I think this will be a good omen for every man who goes into the campaign in the ides of November. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in the latter part of May of this year the President came before Congress and asked us at once to take up the matter of additional taxation, which he deemed necessary to be imposed in order to carry on the war. Pursuant to his request, this bill is now before us. Upon it the Ways and Means Committee have spent months of arduous labor. In its most important features it reflects the views of the administration. The President said that we should turn to war profits, incomes, and luxuries for additional taxes, and the committee has done so. The President said that enormous loans, the proceeds of which were freely spent in stimulation of industry, caused inflation and extravagance, and rightly he concluded that the amount raised by taxation must be greatly increased. The bill provides for the amount desired by the administration. The President has since stated that profiteering existed to a large extent and that the bill should be so framed as to reach profiteers. I am of the opinion that it would be better to use more efficient methods to prevent profiteering at the expense of the Government in the first instance, but I believe that if this bill does not reach the profiteers it will either be because of some lack in administration or because it is not possible to reach them after the profits have reached their pockets.

Speaking broadly, the only important change in the plan of the bill from the present law is the tax on what is called war profits, and the establishment of an advisory board to adjust and equalize the assessments.

Early in the deliberations of the committee plans for a war-profit tax of 80 per cent were suggested. One plan brought forward by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] proposed the levying of this tax as an alternative in cases where it would return the greater amount to the Government. The other, proposed by myself, used the same percentage as a superimposed tax upon the excess-profit tax where the excess-profit tax failed to take the same proportion of the war profits. I shall not stop to give details of my plan, which can be found in the hearings of the committee. The plan was, in fact, rejected before ever being considered, by reason of the Treasury announcement that it favored the alternative method. The alternative plan has its merits and also, as I believe, its defects. It would be futile to discuss them now, but my objections to it will be also found in the hearings.

I believe there are many excellent features connected with the bill. It unites in one law all the internal-revenue statutes which it will be necessary for the ordinary citizen to consult. By taking the individual and copartnership away from liability to the excess-profit tax it has greatly relieved the farmer, the small merchant, and other concerns which did not maintain an accurate and detailed system of bookkeeping covering matters which they usually do not find necessary to include in their accounts. At the same time, by reason of the increase in the income taxes, and especially surtaxes, these parties will pay their proportionate share of taxes. The language of the income tax has been simplified as much as possible. The retention of what is called the normal tax on incomes and its distinction from the surtaxes which it seemed necessary to preserve prevented stating the income tax by mere gradation of rates, but it will be easily understood in the form now presented. The vast sum raised by this bill will be procured without touching necessaries or taxing the consumer except in a very slight degree. Thus the bill avoids adding to the high cost of living, which already bears so hard upon a large portion of our citizens who have not seen their incomes rise in proportion to their necessary expenses. Never did any nation raise such a huge sum by taxes which so largely came from those best able to pay and which so little burdened the masses of the people. This much, and it is much indeed, can be said for the bill; but it does not mean that I concur in all its details, and perhaps no member of the committee does. I voted, however, to report the bill and shall vote for its passage. Money we must have to carry on the war, nor can we take our time in debating how it should be obtained.

Let me say in this connection that the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means, composed of such diverse elements and, I might say, opposing forces, were able to unite in reporting this bill was largely due to the ability, the tact, the fairness, the unfailing good humor, and, above all, to the unquestioned integrity of purpose of the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who presided over that committee. [Applause.]

I shall not at this time go into a discussion of the details of the bill, which are already thoroughly reviewed. Before considering its details the country will want to know something with reference to the enormous amount which it carries. I believe the patriotic citizen will be inclined to accept the decision of Congress and the administration as to how he shall pay his taxes, but he will want to know first why it becomes necessary to tax the people an amount greater than the total cost of four years of the Civil War, bonded indebtedness and all. He will want to know why it is necessary for us to raise a greater amount by taxation in one year than any other country ever did before in the history of the world. He will want to know why, when we are only in the second year of the war, our expenses should follow closely upon those of England for four years of war. It is no answer to these questions to say that our total expenditures for the next fiscal year are estimated at twenty-four billions of dollars, not including contract authorizations, and that this bill proposes to raise one-third of that amount by taxation. Our citizens still have a right to ask whether it is necessary that we should expend such a vast sum and whether our expenses may not properly be lessened. I feel it my duty to give them a candid answer and to state the facts as they are.

Do not misunderstand me here. Neither I nor anyone who has supported the war would ever think of imperiling its success by stinting the money which would be necessary to the end in view. The issues involved are of such importance that we must win the war whatever the price may be. A nation which has, like ours, so freely offered its best blood to be shed in order that a military autocracy might not dominate the world will not for a moment hesitate to pay any taxes necessary to enable it to put forth the greatest military effort that its resources, either of men or materials or credit, will permit. But just as a great expense is necessary to win the war, so the careless expenditure of funds on so vast a scale may be the way to lose it. Lloyd-George once said that the last shilling would win this war, and I much mistake the temper of the American people if they will not spend their last dollar rather than lose it; but it becomes necessary that we should make certain that in this mighty struggle, where financial strength counts so much, that we so husband our resources that we shall have the last dollar to spend. [Applause.] If this be conceded, and it must be, then we ought not to bring in a bill taxing the people of this country $8,000,000,000 without any provision insuring that it will be properly expended.

Ever since the war began, economy has been the last word spoken and the practice least observed among us. Some may say that this is but natural, that war is always wasteful, and necessarily so. I grant it, and will even go further and say that we are the most extravagant and wasteful of all people, but we are in the position of a runner starting upon a marathon race. If we exhaust our strength and vigor by needlessly expending them on the first few miles, we can not expect to win. Are we husbanding our resources and avoiding waste? I shall undertake to show that the contrary is true, and if true it follows that provision should have been made in the bill for ascertaining the amount of this waste, and for finding out when, where, and how it has occurred in order that we may avoid its repetition. What this provision should be I will state after I have first shown its necessity.

Let us for a moment compare our situation with that of Great Britain. Great Britain has an enrollment in its army more than double the number of men that we have. Its navy is more than three times the size of ours. Like us, it is fighting in the war abroad. Like us, it has transported men vast distances to bring them into the fight. It has had vastly more men on the battle line and is compelled to expend vastly more for munitions and other war materials. Yet, although our Army is less than half the size of that of Great Britain, our Navy only about one-third as large, our need of munitions and supplies not one-tenth, the war is costing us daily 50 per cent more than it costs Great Britain, and for the fiscal year will cost us 100 per cent more. I know, as everyone knows, that we are paying our soldiers and sailors much more. I know that we would naturally expect the cost of production of materials in this country to be much higher than in England. But after making all due allowance for such matters, who can deny that our war expense is far out of all proportion as compared to that of Great Britain? It is clear that if we corrected our methods, we would obtain the same results with a decrease of expenditures so great that our success or failure in the war might depend upon our having obtained it. Why, then, should we not correct them?

Where is the fault? Primarily right here in Congress itself, which has practically abdicated its duties with reference to war expenditures. We do not know how the Nation's money is being spent and with a few exceptions we have not taken the means to find out. Where we have made inquiry the results of the investigation have been both astonishing and mortifying. Rumor has it that most of our materials cost us ten times as much as they do in England and twelve times as much as in France. Is this true? Probably an exaggeration, but how much of an exaggeration no one knows, although it could easily be found out. We have only to look around us to see on every hand hand the evidence of waste. Indeed, waste is unavoidable under the system, or rather lack of system, which now prevails.

I concede that in the stress of war we can not always use the ordinary legislative methods in making our appropriations. Emergencies will arise which will not permit of delay and the procedure of times of peace, but it does not follow that Congress can not keep a watchful eye upon expenditures and correct them. On the contrary, this is just what it should do and just what it has not done except in few and rare instances. I do not expect to find actual criminality in the legal sense. So far as actual and literal stealing is concerned, I think there have been few wars in which there has been so little in proportion to the amount of money handled as in this. There are abundant opportunities for making unjustifiable profits without running any risk of a term in the penitentiary. Petty thievings have occurred of a kind that are found in every class of business, but I believe that he who seeks to find malfeasance on a large scale which will subject some person to the operations of our criminal laws is chasing a will-o'-the-wisp, whether it be in relation to the construction of aircraft or elsewhere. While enormous waste can be found, I do not anticipate criminality will be proven.

It may be said that our accounts are all audited by competent and honest officials. True; but these auditors have only to find that the money has not been expended in violation of law. They have nothing to do with the question of whether it has been wisely used. So, also, the General Staff, which controls our military policy, do not find it part of their functions to consider the cost of any policy which may be proposed. Of course, any official who has any proper sense of his duty and who has charge of the expenditure of money will endeavor to obtain as much for the money as is possible, but unfortunately, as all of us know, many of those who make contracts for the Government are inexperienced in the matters with relation to which they deal. Competition has arisen between various departments, so that one department has bid against another. When one department is enlarged, there is a disposition on the part of each other department to enlarge its functions; to extend its operations into fields already occupied by other departments; to undertake operations which can far more economically be carried on under private management; to increase the number of its employees and to see that they are paid at least as high as those in any other division; to ask for increased and enlarged quarters, and in a thousand and one ways either increase of multiply expenses. All this is but natural, and will inevitably exist as long as no proper supervision by Congress is maintained.

The system of purchase under which the greater part of our material is obtained is altogether faulty and can not result but in the Government being greatly overcharged. Instead of inducing economy, it tends directly to waste and extravagance. With respect to many contracts, the vicious cost-plus system still prevails. Testimony given in the hearings before our committee shows that contracts for war materials are being made with wide margins, intended to cover all conceivable losses which the contractor might eventually be found to have sustained. In other words, the contractor puts a figure on the cost to cover every conceivable contingency of loss and adds what he considers a reasonable percentage of profit. Some of these contracts actually contain a clause which might be considered to grant reimbursement for taxes which might eventually be paid on the profits of the transaction. In some of the later contracts it should be said that these faults have been corrected by having a reasonable cost fixed as well as the profit by the contract. In case the reasonable cost is exceeded, a deduction is made from the profit. If the estimated cost is lowered, a premium is given on the profit. Thus the profit rises as the cost decreases and is lessened as the cost becomes higher. Thereby a strong inducement is held out to the contractor to make the cost as low as possible. Why this method was not used in the beginning instead of the cost-plus plan is one of those things that no one will ever find out.

Everyone who has any personal knowledge of the building of the cantonments, shipyards, and ships under the cost-plus contracts knows of the immense waste that occurred. There is gross waste in our navy yards and arsenals, where men are used to do work which ought to be done by machinery. The same waste occurs in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. We are building ships regardless of cost, and wastefully paying any price for labor that may be demanded, with the result that the shipyards increase the pay of all other classes and the cost of the production of all kinds of food and necessaries. Why should you expect a man to work on a farm for less than $7 a day if any man who can handle a saw and a hammer can get a larger amount in the shipyard? And so we go on. As costs of production increase the cost of living increases. New demands for increases of wages are then made, and we travel in a vicious circle, which never ends but ever widens, affecting all classes of the people, and most of all the Government, which pays first 50 per cent more, then 100 per cent more, then 200 and 300 per cent more for what it obtains than it did before the war. If labor costs and contractors' profits had been handled with half the firmness and decision used in England, the home of the labor unions, we would have had no such a situation, but when the workingman sees his work used for profiteering, what can be expected but that his demands will increase. Out of all this arise such conditions as the malodorous Hog Island scandal, which smelled to heaven, with contractors, subcontractors, owners of land, and employees of every kind gouging the Government at every opportunity, until at last it took the management entirely into its own hands, as it should have done in the first place and should do in all cases where the Government furnishes all the money with which to carry on the operations. Whenever the Government furnishes all the capital it should take full control and responsibility and not leave the payment of salaries, commissions, rates, construction charges, and price of land to be determined by the cost-plus plan or anything similar to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that the farmer is very much handicapped at the present time by the withdrawal of labor from the farm by shipyards and other large operations of the Government where high wages are paid?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is a fact. Farm wages have risen beyond anything that was believable. The gentleman from Nebraska told me the other day that he was paying—how much?

Mr. SLOAN. Eighty dollars a month.

Mr. HAUGEN. A hundred dollars a month in Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And board, of course.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say, so long as the gentleman puts that in his speech, that the same difficulty is experienced by manufacturers and employers of labor near by the cities where they have great difficulty in holding labor on account of the high prices offered by contractors under the 10 per cent cost-plus plan. I take it the same thing operates against the individual farmer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And out West we are trying to run the farm with the old men, the women, and girls.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman speaks of the Government taking over these works under certain conditions. Is there any indication after the Government takes them over it is any different in regard to wages?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not as far as wages are concerned, but they have abolished some kinds of graft which prevailed when the Government took them over.

Every department of the Government has been enormously increased without any effort to ascertain whether the employees which it already had were working to full efficiency. Waste. Millions are voted for new buildings in Washington, while the big Maltby Building, owned by the Government, stands unoccupied, and no examination is made as to whether the buildings we have recently constructed are fully occupied. Waste. The newspapers are filled with advertisements for stenographers and typists, and no investigation is made as to the amount of work which those already employed are doing. If there was it would be found that a large number of them are not fully employed. Waste. The Treasury Department buys lands and constructs buildings. When Congress refuses to approve the transaction as wasteful, it is paid for out of the special fund in the hands of the President. The Shipping Board is given millions upon millions to build houses practically as it pleases, and the Secretary of Labor is given millions upon millions more to build houses and recreation centers practically as he pleases, with other things that might be admirable in time of peace for the local governments themselves to build, but which is waste on the part of the Government to build for suburbs which may lack inhabitants after the war. A $500,000 warehouse is built on an aviation field in Ohio to hold material manufactured in the extreme East, which must be sent back to eastern ports for shipment. Troops are shipped from the North to the South and from the South to the North, from the West to the East and back again to where they started. A hundred and sixty so-called conscientious objectors are shipped from western Kansas to central Iowa to meet three commissioners who are to classify them. Waste. Everywhere waste. Millions upon millions are voted for a water-power nitrate plant in the South ostensibly for war purposes, although it can not be completed until after the war is over, and can not then be profitably operated. Waste. Accordingly more millions are spent to erect a steam-power plant for the same purpose and in the same locality, although the expert engineers report that there is a far better and more economical way of obtaining this material. Waste. Enormous waste. This, you say, is congressional waste. It is, although Congress is not responsible for the construction contracts of this project which will enable a single concern to profit to the extent of a million dollars with only a nominal investment in the way of capital.

In fact, if comparisons are made it must be admitted that Congress is one of the worst of the sinners in this respect. It has created boards and commissions galore, and when it could think of no more subjects or departments in which to create commissions, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] well remarked the other day, it has created a new commission to do exactly the same things which form part of the powers and duties of a commission already created. We have boards or commissions on everything that could possibly be invented, thought or dreamed of, except a commission on economy and efficiency.

It is a poor excuse, but the fact is that little of the waste in this line was originated by Congress itself. Rather, it has been brought about by the persistent and continuous demands of the various departments, to which Congress has most unwisely yielded. In the Agricultural bill recently pending in the Senate we have appropriated nominally for the benefit of the farmers millions of dollars for all sorts of things that they did not want and would not use, including instructions how to make cottage cheese and how to put in crops. The crops are already harvested, but I have no doubt the money will be spent. Waste, more waste.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman complains about not having had a committee on economy and expenditures. With whom does the fault lie that such a committee was not established? Is it with the Ways and Means Committee, with the House of Representatives, the Senate of the United States, or some other body or power?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman, I think, will have to go on still higher up to find the reason why such a committee has not been established—a committee on expenditures.

Mr. SLOAN. I hope the speaker will lead me as high up as is necessary so as to get the information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will endeavor to do so before I get through.

Mr. SLOAN. I accept the gentleman's promise.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have never been one of those who joined in the attack on the Food Administration, but I am clearly of the opinion that a large portion of its employees might be safely dispensed with. Its work is carried on here when it ought to be carried on in Chicago, and as a result we are unnecessarily constructing in Washington buildings in which to house its employees or the employees of other departments. Waste, eternally waste. I do not know what these buildings will be, but I have seen some of the houses constructed by the Shipping Board in one of its newly constructed towns. There I saw beautiful six and seven room houses, each one different from any other, turreted and gabled in the most expensive style, the architect having never for a moment considered the expense of construction for houses that after the war will be inhabited by bats and owls. I wish that the ordinary Congressman could find in Washington in war times such living accommodations.

What is the result? It is this: We have been in the war a year and a half and spent about as much as England in three years, although, as I have said, during most of the time they have had an army twice the size of ours and a navy three times as large. But some say we have incurred a large expense in the way of preparation and that our appropriations will decrease. Do not deceive yourselves. We have merely entered on the threshold of the war, so far as expenses are concerned. So far we have only had about 200,000 to 300,000 men on the fighting line. We expect to have five times as many and our total enrollment to be more than twice what it is now. Where we are now using shells by the thousands or the millions we shall be using them by the tens of thousands or the tens of millions. Judging from the past, I speak to some who will not hear, but I warn the country that we can not go on this way indefinitely, and if we could, there is no justification for placing such burdens either on the present generation or those of the future.

Competitive bidding is not made use of to the extent it should be and competition is often on the wrong side, the Government bidding against itself. The system adopted by the Navy is highly commendable, and if it were better coordinated with the War Department, so that one department would not bid against the other, little improvement could be suggested in it; but the War Department has, for the most part, proceeded upon plans that enormously increased the cost of what it purchased. At first the Quartermaster's Department would neither make public its needs in such a way that they would generally be known and competition result, nor would it make public the prices which it paid. Time and again contracts were let at prices far above those at which other parties stood ready to furnish the same goods, and even yet it takes no proper methods to insure competition.

The aircraft construction section, which, it should be understood, is not a part of the Army, has been conspicuous for its waste, but we know it is conspicuous only because it is the only one that has been investigated by Congress.

The testimony on the hearings before our committee shows that at the outbreak of the war the piano manufacturers, whose business was dull and whose factories were already fitted to make everything in connection with frames for airplanes, desired to put their works at the service of the Government. Instead of accepting their proposal the Aircraft Board erected costly buildings which, according to the testimony before our committee, are being little used to-day. This was waste, pure waste, and the board continued to waste money in building machines that were experiments when models could be obtained of machines whose success had been demonstrated. The report issued by the Senate committee shows that practically all of the $680,000,000 given to this board has been wasted. Nearly $3,000,000 was put into buildings located in a swamp which is sooner or later to be flooded, as it is part of a drainage reservoir.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Was not that field designed for the construction, the use, and practice of submarines rather than airplanes?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In the future it will be better adapted for that purpose, I think.

But the hundreds of millions that have been wasted in this connection are not the greatest waste. That occurred on the field of battle. Oh, the pity of it! Oh, the shame of it! that the lifeblood of America's young men should have been poured out upon the battle field because of lack of airplanes for proper scouting work and for defense against the German aircraft that, flying low, raked their lines with a storm of bullets from machine guns and dropped bombs upon them during the advance from the Marne.

Some say that this is of the past and "let the dead past bury its dead." I am willing, provided along with the past we could bury those who are responsible for such conditions. [Applause.] But unfortunately it is not of the past. The same conditions still continue. In the Evening Star of day before yesterday I find the following item:

GERMAN FLIERS BUSY.

The German aviators contributed materially to the rear-guard defense. Every yard the French and Americans advanced was noted by the enemy aviators, who also took an active part in the efforts to stop the allied progress, but in the long run their efforts were as ineffectual as those of the line of machine-gun nests. The airmen repeatedly bombed the Americans and let loose with their machine guns while flying low. The light forces advancing, however, were never more than momentarily checked, as, after disposing themselves for defense in a way their mobile formation made possible, their progress would be resumed after a moment or so.

Does some one ask how long such reprehensible conditions are to continue? I answer that they will continue as long as an attempt is made to conceal them and cover them up.

With proper supervision by Congress no such follies and blunders which approach a crime would have been permitted and the repetition of the mistakes and blunders in other quarters would be prevented. Only a management which has something which it wishes to conceal is afraid of investigation. We know now why such persistent efforts were made to suppress an investigation with reference to aircraft construction until the greater portion of the facts had leaked out through sources that could not be stopped up. Rightly or wrongly, the effort to suppress investigations elsewhere must inevitably give to the American people the opinion that investigations are needed because they are obstructed and disapproved.

Everyone admits that waste is going on, and from high quarters has come the suggestion that a budget system should be adopted. A budget system in time of peace would doubtless be much improvement over our present procedure, but no country ever found a budget system practical in time of war. England has been compelled to abandon it, and no statements are now presented by the war department to the House of Commons or budgets by the chancellor of the exchequer. The special feature of a budget system is the fixing in advance of the amount which may be expended by a department for the current year, but it is obvious that if Pershing says that new airplanes must be sent him because the old ones are worthless, or that he has not artillery enough, or that material has in some way been lost, worn out, or destroyed in the course of the war and must be replaced, that he can not be told that the estimates for the year are made up and that the War Department can spend no more. The vicissitudes of war absolutely preclude determining in advance the amount which will be expended to carry it on. Our own War Department has been compelled again and again in the course of the last year to come to Congress and ask for additional appropriations. The requirements in the Army and Navy are constantly changed with new developments and the fortune or misfortune with which the war may be carried on. It is obvious that however advantageous the budget system may be in time of peace it is unworkable in time of war.

For the same reason we can not always avoid voting sums in bulk. War requires decisions to be made instantly, and urgent matters can not wait for the passage of a special authorization with the cost of every item specified.

What we need is congressional supervision through a joint committee on expenditures and less disposition on the part of Congress to constitute merely a rubber stamp to be impressed upon measures that are presented to it. [Applause.]

No other nation proceeds as we do. From the first England has been far more economical than we have, but it soon found it necessary to appoint a committee on expenditures of over 20 members, which has been divided into various subcommittees and has presented a voluminous report. Through this committee careful supervision is kept of whatever that nation expends. Great savings have already been made through this committee, and the effect of its watchful eyes has been very apparent. Certain kinds of artillery are now actually being obtained cheaper by England than in the early part of the war, and numerous instances where great savings could be effected have been pointed out and the suggestions acted upon.

At the outset of the war I proposed the appointment of a joint committee on expenditures taken from the House and Senate and a provision for it ought to have been carried in this bill, and I doubt not it would have been carried had it not been for the opposition from the White House. The committee should, as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], be made up equally of Republicans and Democrats taken from the House and Senate. Its findings would be non-political and would everywhere be accepted by the country. Why should anyone but those who fear exposure be afraid of it? It would have nothing to do with military operations, but it would greatly lessen the amount carried by bills like the one we now have before us, and no step that Congress could now take would more contribute to the winning of the war. The sooner it is appointed the less will be the regret that it was not established earlier.

I do not now expect that such a provision will become a part of this bill, but I do expect that the march of events will ultimately compel its adoption.

Mr. Chairman, we can make no greater mistake, nor one that is more likely to prove fatal to our success in this war, than to fail to take a correct view of our surroundings. We should neither reverse the glass, so that we are looking through the wrong end of the telescope, nor should we use one that unduly magnifies our difficulties. Our task is heavy but we are strong and our resources so great that if we do not waste them victory is certain. What we need, what we must have for ultimate success, is the truth, always the open, naked truth. Pitiless publicity is ever the greatest enemy of waste and inefficiency. Where resources are evenly balanced the side that turns on the light will win. To stifle publicity is but to insure that the mistakes and the blunders which have heretofore been perpetrated will continue unabated.

There is no lack in spirit or performance on the part of our Army. Its glorious record has been further extended upon the fields of France. The names of Cantigny, Chateau-Thierry, and a score of other battles will forever live in our history. While our soldiers have been struggling and conquering, fighting and dying, the slimy trail of the profiteer has marred our record on this side of the ocean and the slacker has been permitted to use their heroism for his own protection. Every day the blood-soaked soil of Europe gives new proof of the valor and devotion of the men who have willingly responded to their country's call and offered their lives that freedom might not perish from the earth. It is our duty to see that their lives are not wasted through waste and inefficiency at home, and we shall play an ignoble part, indeed, if we lack the courage to strike at the root of those evils which may render all their noble sacrifices in vain. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present, and I think we ought to have a quorum in the House when an important bill like this is being discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and evidently there is none. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and that he presented therewith a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-three Members are present, a quorum. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I wish to say at the very outset that I speak here to-day not as a Republican, but as a willing worker in the cause and as a Representative responsible to all of the people of my district, regardless of party. [Applause.] There is no one here, I think, more interested in the welfare of my party than I. I confess that I rejoiced at the welcome news from Maine this morning, but in a crisis like this I subordinate that interest entirely to what I conceive to be the welfare of all the American people and the winning of this war.

Never before in my 14 years' service in this House have I approached the consideration of any measure with such a sense of heavy responsibility. We are about to impose upon the American people taxes far higher than they have ever borne; we are about to burden them as no peoples in the history of the world have been burdened; we are about to cause them to pay in taxes a sum which would have financed the entire cost of the Civil War for both sides, and then left something over. Such huge taxes as these, my colleagues, are not to be imposed without the most solemn deliberation, and each one of us should be fully alive to the grave responsibility that rests upon him.

Is it too much to hope that gentlemen will not attempt to materially amend this bill except only after the most careful thought and the most thorough consideration? Not that it is perfect, by any means, not that it may not develop that amendments may be found advisable; but at least this can be said of it, that it represents the final compromise and meeting of minds of 23 men of all shades of economic thought and after three months' work, who, if gifted with no uncommon wisdom or ability, have at least proceeded deliberately, cautiously, and conscientiously, and without a thought or suggestion of partisanship. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] yesterday both criticized and criticized very properly from their point of view certain features of this bill, but their criticism was constructive and not destructive, and was animated not by partisanship, but by a sense of their responsibility as Members of this House. Any man who would seek in this solemn hour to obtain partisan advantage or make political capital for home consumption out of such a bill as this is, to my mind, a creature so infinitesimally small that when he shall retire to private life, as he speedily will if he meets his deserts, his neighbors may well say of him, "There goes nothing."

In the imposition of taxes such as these we must always keep in mind two principal considerations: First, not to reduce or destroy the revenue-producing power of the country; and, second, not to impair its capacity to absorb the coming issues of liberty bonds. Both of these things would inevitably happen from injudicious or over taxation. I need not elaborate the point that excessive taxation would impair the country's ability to buy bonds. That is self-evident. But why it should destroy revenue is perhaps less clear and may deserve a word of explanation. To persons who have not given the question the most serious thought it might seem axiomatic that higher taxes will always mean higher revenues. Such, however, is emphatically not the case, for two reasons:

In the first place, if you impose too high a tax on incomes, and those particularly of the larger class, you will inevitably drive the capital from which these incomes are derived into nontaxable securities, and, in the second place, if by excessive taxes on business profits you destroy the human initiative and ambition to engage in those businesses, you will thereby destroy the sources from which these revenues may be derived. You may by taxation take from a man all he made this year, but you can not force him to remain in business, nor can you prevent his putting his capital where its returns can not be taxed next year.

There are outstanding in this country to-day something over $8,000,000,000 worth of Federal, State, and municipal securities, the proceeds of which are not subject to Federal taxation. Under this bill we are endeavoring to reach those State, county, and municipal securities which may be hereafter issued, though I admit that there is some doubt as to the constitutionality of that course. This, however, will in no wise affect those already issued and outstanding. These nontaxable securities would offer a tempting and fruitful field for investment for those whose incomes we may overtax, in which case no one will be the loser except the Treasury of the United States.

This bill imposes a flat tax of 80 per cent on war profits; a tax running as high as 70 per cent on excess profits, and a tax running as high as 77 per cent on incomes. This, I think, is high enough. In fact, I am not sure but that it is mighty near the danger mark. We must remember that this is a bill to raise revenue, not a bill to reorganize society. The question as to what some of us may think is a proper amount for a rich man to live on in war time is subordinate now to the amount we can properly and effectively exact from wealth for the support of our military program.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has just stated that this bill imposes 77 per cent tax on incomes in some cases. Does the gentleman know that the average State, county, city, and school taxes collected by the political subdivisions indicated already amount to about 31 per cent on the incomes, and that this added to it would make it 108 per cent?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, the gentleman is hardly correct about that. I do not know exactly what the average of State taxation may be, and I should think that 30 per cent is not much out of the way; but that is deducted from the income before the Federal tax is imposed, and therefore the total tax could never reach 100 per cent.

Remember this, gentlemen, that just so surely as you impose a tax which amounts to plunder, just so surely will you overshoot the mark and render difficult, if not impossible, our task of furnishing the money necessary to effectively prosecute the war.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. To a question that grows out of the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]: In comparing the rates of tax that this bill entails upon the country with the rates of tax in England, would the rates carried in this bill represent all the tax that the country pays, as would be the case in England, where they do not have the subdivision taxes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. In England, as I understand, the only taxes outside of the national tax are some local municipal taxes. There are there no such things as State or county taxes.

Mr. FESS. But there are people claiming that we are not laying as high a tax as European countries are laying. Is it not possible that we may lay an even higher tax than European countries when you take into consideration our local taxes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. We are not laying as high a tax on certain classes of incomes as does Great Britain, but on the larger incomes we are imposing a decidedly larger tax.

Mr. MADDEN. How would it be when it is combined with the local taxes that I have been talking about?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Probably the taxes provided in this bill on incomes of almost all kinds will, if added to the taxes that must be paid in the States, represent a higher rate of taxation than that levied in Great Britain.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is a municipal bond that is nontaxable under the laws of the States taxable under this bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No municipal bonds are taxable under this bill except those hereafter to be issued.

Mr. GARNER. And then only the income from the bond.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; then only the income from the bond. Of course they are to be taxable as a part of the income of the holder.

Even more important than the question of the effect that this bill will have upon the revenue is the question of the effect it may have on the coming issue of liberty bonds, and I ask every Member of this House during the consideration of this bill to keep that fact uppermost in mind, because at least two-thirds of the revenue that we must raise in the coming year is to be by bonds.

This tax bill, huge as it is, represents only one-third of that amount. Nothing could be more disastrous to our cause than that the bond issue should be a failure, and we should be scrupulously careful therefore that nothing we do here shall prejudice its success. Most of the bonds will be purchased by individuals, and their purchasing power will be directly affected by the taxes on their incomes.

Let us examine, therefore, the income tax provided in this bill to see how it may affect the salability of these bonds. First, let me lay it down as an axiom that the higher the normal tax and the lower the surtax the more attractive will be the liberty bonds as a field for investment. That is self-evident, it seems to me, because the income derived from liberty bonds is liable only to the surtax and not to the normal tax. Therefore the higher the normal tax the more valuable the bond is as an investment.

It seems to me self-evident also that these bonds must be made at least a fairly attractive investment if five or six billions of them are next month to find a ready market. England, with a 30 per cent normal tax and about a 50 per cent maximum surtax, is in a much more fortunate position, so far as the bond question is concerned.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] yesterday thought that our income rate, our tax rate on the lower incomes—and he particularly spoke, I think, of incomes from $5,000 to $50,000—was too high. Now, let me contrast those lower income rates with the rates now imposed in England, keeping in mind always the fact that England has a 30 per cent normal tax while we have only a 12 per cent normal tax. The tax provided in this bill on an income of $5,000 is $180. In England it is $937.50. In this bill the tax on incomes of $10,000 is $845; in England, $2,625. On $15,000 in this bill, $1,795; in England, $4,812. On $25,000 in this bill, $4,245; in England, $8,937. The two taxes are gradually approaching each other, as you will see. On an income of $50,000 in this bill the tax is $12,495; in England, $20,937. And it is not until we get to incomes of $300,000 that the tax provided in this bill is higher than the tax provided in England.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My criticism yesterday was directed more particularly to the raising of the normal tax from the 4 per cent that it is now and from 10 per cent that we had in the bill originally to 12 per cent, as in the bill as it is now presented; and my argument, while it applied also to these lower surtax brackets, was directed particularly to the fact that the men of small means paying this normal tax would be less able to buy the liberty bonds than heretofore and would be at a disadvantage in the general financial arrangement laid down in this income-tax provision.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I hope to be able to show that the question of the size of the normal tax is more important with regard to the attractiveness of liberty bonds as an investment than it is as to the question of revenue or the amount of tax that it may raise. With our normal tax at 12 per cent and a 65 per cent maximum surtax upon the higher incomes, we are not in a position in this respect so fortunate as Great Britain.

Personally I should have been willing to vote for a normal tax of 15 per cent, or even higher. But I think probably 12 per cent will be enough if the surtaxes remain substantially as they are. At best, though, we are treading on mighty dangerous ground, my colleagues, and a single misstep may bring disastrous consequences.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. GARNER. The normal tax as levied in this bill will make the liberty bonds equal to 4.85, if I make the calculation correctly, whereas, if we had a 15 per cent normal tax, the liberty bond would equal a municipal bond at 5 per cent interest; because for each 1 cent that you levy in the normal tax, you equal 0.005 per cent interest of a municipal loan or other security; so the higher the rate you make on the normal tax which the liberty bond is exempt from, that much more desirable becomes that security as compared with other securities in the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Texas is absolutely right. In other words, the raising of the normal tax accomplishes precisely the result that you would accomplish if you raised the interest on the bond. Congress has not authorized any higher rate. I hope we may never have to raise the interest rate on the liberty bonds, but certainly we can not avoid the raising of that rate unless we keep the normal tax as high or perhaps a little higher than it is in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the rate of interest have anything to do with the value of the bonds, and is that the reason that the bonds are selling at a discount now, because the interest is not high enough in the gentleman's estimation?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think that is one of the reasons, under our present low normal tax. Of course, another reason why the bonds are not selling at par is that many men the moment they buy a bond immediately sell it on the market. We have also heard of instances of men in small country towns, the storekeepers in small country towns, who advertise that they will pay $95 cash for a $100 liberty bond, and it may be that in many cases poor farmers or others who have bought these bonds and feel temporarily embarrassed are glad to get that $95 cash. All these things have a tendency to depress the bonds, and with the normal tax in this country of only 4 per cent and the high rate that we have to day in surtaxes, the liberty bond is by no means as good an investment as the average municipal bond, and you have got to ask men to be very patriotic, particularly the rich men, to buy these bonds with a normal tax of only 4 per cent.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. GARNER. There are three ways by which we can hold a greater inducement to people to buy liberty bonds. One of them is to increase the normal tax, say, to 15 or 20 per cent, another is to increase the rate of interest, and the third is to increase the Cannon amendment, so called. Those three methods make it more desirable. For instance, if you increase the normal tax to 15 per cent you would have a 5½ per cent liberty bond. If you increased the Cannon amendment, say to $20,000, you relieve everyone owning $20,000 worth of bonds from any taxes whatever, and is not either one of these methods the better remedy to make them more attractive than it is to increase the rate of interest and carry that on through 20, 30, or 40 years?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree absolutely with my friend from Texas, and I will say that if the proposal comes to us to increase the amount of the so-called Cannon amendment even as high as $25,000, I shall favor it. It stands now as I recall it at $5,000. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if that is not so?

Mr. MADDEN. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I recall it, the original amendment proposed $10,000, but the House cut it to $5,000.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recall that, but the House passed it at $5,000.

Has the gentleman noticed, as I know he has, that the 3½ per cent bonds of the first liberty loan which were nontaxable for any purpose, either State or National, are now selling at a premium, whereas the 4¼ per cents are selling, I think, at about 94 or 95. I am not sure about that. Has the gentleman considered the proposition, for a successful liberty drive, of legislation that would authorize, say, 3½ per cent without being subject to taxation, as against the 4¼ per cent bonds that are subject to surtaxes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that I have given a good deal of consideration to that subject. I was rather disinclined at the beginning to vote for a provision which would make the 4 or 4½ per cents subject to a surtax, but I dislike to put my opinion on questions like this as against the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury and his advisers. They are emphatically of the opinion that these bonds should be subject to a surtax, and as I say I am perfectly willing to go along, though I am ready at any moment to vote for any measure, whether in the direction of the raising of the normal tax or of the raising of the amount of bonds that can be held by an individual not subject to the surtax to a substantially larger amount provided in the amendment originally offered, and most wisely, I think, by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. PLATT. I want to say that when the last liberty bond bill was up I made a proposition to increase the Cannon amendment to a sum which would yield an income equal to the minimum amount exempt from taxation under the income tax; that is to say, to increase the amount of bonds that a man could hold to an amount that would produce $1,000 income. If the rate is 4 per cent, that would be $25,000. If the rate is raised to 4½ per cent, it would be $22,500, and 5 per cent $20,000, and so on. The capital sum exempted would decrease with each increase of interest rate. I wrote a letter in regard to that to the Federal Reserve Board, and they expressed considerable interest, and did not make any opposition to it. There did not seem to be any opportunity to present the amendment for a vote at the time. I simply proposed it in a brief speech. Such an exemption could arouse no resentment, and I think that is the way the Cannon amendment should be raised.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Perhaps that would be the best way. At any rate I am willing, as I say, to vote for any proposition of that kind which will make the coming liberty bond an attractive investment. It may be absolutely necessary, gentlemen, with a tax bill like this confronting the American people, to do what we can to make the liberty bond a more attractive investment than it now is to the men of wealth of this country. I shall not be surprised if before this session of Congress adjourns we will be called on to pass legislation of that nature.

We must keep steadily in mind always the fact that the bulk of our war expenditures must inevitably be financed by the sale of bonds. Just what the relative proportion should be between bonds and taxes it would not be valuable now to discuss. It is bound to depend on circumstances and conditions as they may hereafter arise.

I was unwilling at the outset to subscribe to the program advocated by the Secretary of the Treasury that our war expenditures should be financed on a fifty-fifty basis. I am unwilling now to subscribe to the proposition that it shall be now financed on a two-thirds and one-third basis. I am willing to vote for this $8,000,000,000 tax measure, not because it happens to be one-third of $24,000,000,000 but because I think a tax of at least $8,000,000,000 is necessary, for I am firmly of the opinion that the amount of $24,000,000,000 estimated for the expenses of next year is an underestimate rather than an overestimate.

My belief is that a larger proportion of the war expenditures than two-thirds ought to be borne by coming generations. I subscribe, therefore, to the statement in our report that the adoption temporarily of the one-third plan does not commit Congress to that proportion in the future. I would not have joined in any report which could be regarded as committing me in the future to any definite percentage.

I did not believe at the beginning of the formation of this bill, nor did I think any member of the Ways and Means Committee did, that it would be possible to raise by taxation $8,000,000,000 without resorting to consumption taxes.

But we have succeeded, for there is no doubt that this bill will raise $8,000,000,000 and more, if the sources from which the revenues are being derived remain unimpaired. I shall not stop to debate here whether it might not have been wise to raise a portion of the revenue by tariff duties and internal-revenue taxes on articles of daily consumption. Under the conditions it was thought inadvisable and impracticable to do so.

Tariff duties and consumption taxes remain as a field to fall back on in case we shall have to raise more taxes, or in case some existing sources of revenue are destroyed by legislation or otherwise.

This bill remains as it stands a tax on wealth pure and simple. But in my belief it taxes wealth pretty nearly to the straining point, and any further taxes must be borne by people purchasing articles of daily necessity.

The main revenue-producing features to this bill in relative order are these:

War and excess-profits taxes, $3,200,000,000.
Individual-income taxes, $1,500,000,000.
Taxes on beverages containing alcohol, $1,066,000,000.
Corporation taxes, $900,000,000.
Tobacco taxes, $350,000,000.
And the rest, taxes on luxuries or near luxuries.

In my judgment, this is about the limit that can be raised from any of these sources. If you should attempt to tax higher you would lose revenue, and, correspondingly, if you should by legislation destroy any one of them you will have to make up the deficit by taxes on articles of daily consumption.

Even since this bill was reported to the House a source of revenue estimated at $240,000,000 has been destroyed, or will shortly be destroyed, by Executive order. The real loss of revenue in this bill will be considerably larger, because connected with the industry about to be destroyed are incomes and profits which are taxable under this bill, and various incidentals which will probably bring the loss of revenue up to between $400,000,000 and $500,000,000. It thus seems that we may be forced to consumption taxes sooner than any of us expected, and the raising of even so comparatively small a sum as $240,000,000 by consumption taxes is no light task. The obvious thing to do, it seems to me, would be to resort, in the first place, to the tariff and to choose a few articles which will obviously be high-revenue producers. Those which most prominently stand out are coffee, tea, rubber, wool, hides, and sugar.

Now, if we were to put a tax of 7 cents a pound on coffee, 25 cents on tea, 10 per cent ad valorem on rubber, 20 per cent on wool, and 15 per cent on hides, and an extra cent on sugar, you barely raise $240,000,000. And yet these particular duties are higher than I have ever heard suggested:

A duty of 7 cents a pound on coffee would produce approximately	$91,000,000
A duty of 25 cents a pound on tea would produce approximately	25,000,000
A duty of 10 per cent ad valorem on rubber would produce approximately	19,500,000
A duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on wool would produce approximately	20,000,000
A duty of 15 per cent ad valorem on hides would produce approximately	32,000,000
A duty of 1 cent a pound on sugar would produce approximately	53,000,000
Total	240,500,000

This is offered simply as an illustration of the difficulty we are bound to encounter in raising substantial revenue by consumption taxes. If the entire schedule from which this $240,000,000 is derived is destroyed our difficulties increase immeasurably.

No matter what our opinions may be as to the wisdom and justice of the case, let us not deceive ourselves and let us not deceive the country as to the revenue aspect of this question. We owe it to ourselves and we owe it to the country to speak with perfect frankness about the ultimate cost of prohibition. It is estimated that taxes imposed on the sale of beverages containing alcohol will produce a revenue of $1,066,600,000. It is obvious, therefore, that if this source of revenue is entirely destroyed we lose over a billion dollars; but that is not all by any means. The experts of the Treasury Department have estimated that the special taxes on dealers and manufacturers and the income taxes and excess-profits taxes that will be derived from persons engaged in this industry would amount to over $400,000,000. Besides this the loss of revenue to the various States would have to be supplemented by taxation of some sort by the States, which would be deductible from the incomes of citizens of these various States, and which would reach such a large amount that the Treasury estimates that the probable revenue to be derived under this bill, instead of being $8,000,000,000, will be only a little more than $6,000,000,000. The problem of raising these extra $2,000,000,000, involving as it does immense taxes to be imposed on necessaries of life, is one that we must face, and its solution will demand the best thought of the best statesmanship in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the gentleman ever considered a sales tax or know how much that will bring?

Mr. LONGWORTH. A general sales tax is a consumption tax, pure and simple. It bears with equal force upon the poorest man in the country and upon the richest. The gentleman from Michigan and I probably drink just as much tea as John D. Rockefeller, and probably more, because I imagine our digestion is better, but we will pay just the same tax or more than Mr. Rockefeller, and that is the difference between the system of taxation in this bill and the system of consumption taxes. Under the bill as it stands now—and I am not defending every provision of it—it does tax throughout those best able to pay the taxes. The moment we come to consumption taxes, whether by revenue tariffs on noncompeting articles or by a sales tax, just at that moment we begin to tax those who are least able to pay. That is the problem we have before us, because, as I have endeavored to point out, we have gone the absolute limit consistent with any degree of safety in taxing wealth as such, and hereafter we must, when we have to raise revenue, be forced to consumption taxes on necessities.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. A sales tax is also very difficult to administer, is it not, and requires a lot of time of business men and their clerks, and also the customers who stand at the counters. I believe that is the system they have in France now. They have to stand around and wait while there is prepared a receipt which must be put on a certain form and be numbered. It takes not only the time of the clerk but of the purchaser.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is correct. Even in France to-day they have no general sales tax. They have a sales tax on luxuries and near luxuries, and also a tax upon which the plan adopted in this bill is modeled, of taxing an article which, per se, is a necessity, as a luxury when its sale price reaches a certain point. The Treasury Department has told us that such a general tax on sales would be tremendously difficult to administer.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Along that line, I would like to know if the gentleman has ever considered the question of what might be derived from a sales tax on real estate sales, and let me elaborate a little upon that. You have in section 201 a definition of income, in which you state that an income is the amount received for the sale of real, personal, or mixed property over and above what was paid for it, if it was purchased after March 1, 1913, or over and above what its estimated value was if you owned it before that time. The result is that under that definition every man who sells any kind of property must account as a part of his income for the proceeds of that property over what he gave for it or over its value March 1, 1913—a very difficult proposition, it seems to me—making it absolutely necessary to see what every article was sold for, and at the same time a very unjust proposition. The whole unearned increment which pays no taxes without a sale is thrown into the scale and must pay a tax, if a sale of real estate or any other property occurs. Would it not be more equitable to select such articles as you wish to put a sale tax on, as, for instance, real estate, and impose a straight tax of so much upon the proceeds of every real estate sale? Could that not be easily done?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, as the gentleman has indicated, we do now indirectly tax sales of real estate in the sense that we compel any man who sells real estate at a profit to return that profit as income, and in that way we tax it. If you tax the sale direct of a piece of real estate, I am inclined to think that would be equivalent to taxing the real estate itself as property, which, in my belief, is unconstitutional. I agree with the gentleman upon the general sales tax. Of course, we shall have to come to it eventually, perhaps, but so long as we can avoid it I hope that we will not tax the sale of overalls in exactly the same way that we tax the sale of diamonds. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that under this very bill you do tax sales of real estate, only you tax them for a very small amount—50 cents on $500?

But it seems to me that the principle is the same, that you can make a more equitable tax by taxing sales of real estate, not taxing real estate, but just as now you call it a tax on deeds and conveyances, call it a tax on the privilege of executing a deed, and you can make it equal, exact, and just, and not just call a man's income this year the unearned increment as for the five years; it may be that you can sell it for more in 1920, and that is eight years, and 1921 will be still further. You add the increased value on, not the value, for it is admitted universally the dollar has gone down and property you paid $50 for in 1913 is worth $100 to-day, and yet if a man sells that property at market value to-day he pays an income tax as if on the profit, whereas if we treated every transaction alike and taxed all sales of real estate a certain per cent, say 1 per cent, you would get much more revenue and be much more equitable in the distribution of the tax.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman's suggestion is interesting; I confess I have not given it very much thought——

Mr. HARDY. I would like the gentleman to roll that over in his mind.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know whether this is breaking in on the thread of the gentleman's argument or not, but inasmuch as the gentleman has been interrupted, perhaps he can answer now. This bill provides a basis of ascertaining war profits and excess profits, the prewar period of 1911, 1912, and 1913, as I understand it. Now, does the gentleman think that the profit that a man made in business in 1911, 1912, or 1913 is a proper basis to go on in estimating what his profit in the same business ought to be now, considering the depreciated value of the dollar now as compared with what it was then? In other words——

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will be so kind as to postpone his question, I will answer it when I get to the excess and war profits tax.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. LONGWORTH. On the whole, this bill, in my judgment, is a vast improvement over the present law, not only in construction, but in principle. With regard to the new system of taxes on profits, particularly, a radical change has been made. In the first place the excess-profits tax no longer applies to individuals. Not only is this a wise policy on broad economic grounds, in my opinion, but more important still it automatically wipes out that monstrosity in the present law known as section 209, under which a man who derives his income from personal effort and personal service pays a higher tax than a man who derives his income from invested capital. That, to my mind, was an utterly indefensible proposition, and most of you will recall that I had no hesitation in saying so. Under this bill I rejoice to say that in no case will salaries and professional incomes be taxed at a higher rate than incomes derived from capital.

I wish we could have gone even further. I wish we could have provided under the income tax that incomes derived from personal effort and personal service should have been taxed at a less rate than incomes derived from invested capital. This is a principle that I have been contending for in Congress and out for a good many years, and I was delighted to find it recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury in his communication sent to the chairman of the committee on the 5th of June. The chairman of the committee has done me the honor to say that I contended for the principle of a differential between earned and unearned incomes from the beginning of the formation of this bill, but the difficulties, both in the drafting of such a provision and in its administration seemed to be insuperable, and it was only at the very last moment and at the final conference between the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee, of which I was a member, and the Secretary of the Treasury and his advisers that I felt forced to abandon my contention. I am comforted, however, to know that we have made substantial progress in that direction and I feel confident that a way will sometime, and I hope speedily, be found to enact into law a differential in favor of earned as against unearned income.

I am glad, too—and now I am going to proceed to answer in some degree the question of the gentleman from Illinois—I am glad, too, that the principle of the war-profits tax has been adopted in this bill. I have been opposed to the principle of the excess-profits tax from the time of its inception, and I have only supported it, as I am supporting it to-day, as a war measure producing a very great revenue, because it does catch some very rich corporations that made large profits before the war which, under the war-profits system, would go entirely untaxed. Gentlemen will recall that when the excess-profits tax was advanced here as a revenue measure in time of peace, that being in the January before the war—January, 1917—I opposed it on the floor and offered an amendment to strike it from the bill. I hope you will pardon me now if I quote a sentence or two from what I said on that occasion, merely for the purpose of showing for my own satisfaction that my criticism at that time seems in the light of subsequent events to have been justified. I said this:

> You propose a tax upon business, a tax upon the business of the country, big and little, and particularly little; a tax based not upon magnitude of operation but upon economy of operation; a tax to be imposed simply and solely upon efficiency of production. You propose a tax which will be borne in the main not by men of large capital but by men of small capital. You propose to tax the American citizens who by intelligent, progressive, and economical management of their resources have done a prosperous business and to let those of larger capital but whose methods have been wasteful, extravagant, and unprogressive go free.

A few weeks ago the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the committee and said this of the excess-profits tax, after an experience of something more than a year in its administration.

> The excess-profits tax must rest upon the wholly indefensible notion that it is a function of taxation to bring all profits down to one level, with relation to the amount of the capital invested, and to deprive industry, foresight, and sagacity of their fruits. The excess-profits tax exempts capital and burdens brains, ability, and energy. The excess-profits tax falls less heavily on big business than on small business, because big business is generally overcapitalized and small business is often undercapitalized.

I hope it may be pardonable in me to take some satisfaction in that statement of the Secretary of the Treasury in justifying, at least to some extent, my predictions of the effect of the excess-profits tax.

In principle, to my mind, war-profits tax is the fairest of all taxes in time of war. The only trouble about it is that it does not catch, as does the excess-profits tax, the profits of some of the richest corporations in the country. But it is anticipated that nine-tenths of all the corporations of this country will fall this year under the war-profits tax, and it will therefore raise enormous revenue.

Responding more specifically to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, I can see no possible injustice in subjecting corporations who were going along fairly well, we will say, before the war, and have made tremendous profits since the war, to a tax imposed upon the difference between their prewar profits and their war profits.

It is possible that some gentlemen may not understand exactly what the war-profits tax is, as provided in this bill. To my mind it is absolutely extraordinary that the expert draftsmen of the Ways and Means Committee have been able to put in a page and a quarter what it takes under the British law something like 45 pages to cover. A page and a quarter of this bill, gentlemen, covers the whole question of the war-profits tax, a tax which will raise something like $2,000,000,000. If the question of the gentleman from Illinois were based on the proposition that, no matter what or how small the average prewar profits of a corporation were, 80 per cent of their present profit should be taken, I would say that it was not a just tax. But when, as in this law, no matter how unsuccessful a corporation may have been before the war, it is entitled to a deduction of at least 10 per cent upon its invested capital, to my mind no more fair or just tax could be conceived of in time of war.

And there is another feature of it, gentlemen, which I think of at least equal importance, and that is the effect it will have upon the speeding up of war supplies, because it will protect those Government officials whose business it is to make contracts on the part of the Government. Some of the most important contracts that these officials, high and low, are called upon to make must be made without any basis whatever of actual knowledge. A corporation, for instance, may be called upon to produce some article for the use of the Government which it has never manufactured before.

It must, of course, take tremendous risks, and if everything goes well it will probably make a profit so enormous that it would be regarded as an excessively bad contract from the Government's point of view. If, however, it is understood in advance that the Government is going to get back 80 per cent of its profits, if it is successful, the Government is not a loser and the corporation ought not to complain. I think our experience has proven that if we had had a large war-profits tax at the beginning the production of many war necessities which has sadly lagged behind would have been greatly speeded up, because then there would have been no necessity for a long period of haggling as to the costs of material and other details which has worked to the very serious disadvantage of the country.

Let me illustrate a moment. Suppose the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who sits in front of me, was a manufacturer of machine tools and I the director of munitions? I want the gentleman from Kansas to make me some machinery for boring big guns. The gentleman from Kansas has no factory suitable; he has no machinery suitable; but he is perhaps the only man who has an organization which could by any possibility produce these absolutely necessary things. Without a war-profits tax I am in this position: The gentleman from Kansas very justly says, "I shall have to risk an immense amount of capital; I shall have to build a factory; I shall have to build new machinery; I shall have to develop processes, and I can not afford to take that contract unless you leave me a big leeway."

I, as a Government official, do not feel justified in giving him all the leeway he asks, because if everything turns out right he will make a profit so huge that I will be in the position of having been responsible for the waste of an enormous amount of the Government's money. But if we have a war-profits tax of 80 per cent I can say to the gentleman from Kansas, "Go ahead; I will not haggle with you about the details or the cost of your materials. We want these big guns, and we want them now. Go ahead and make a big profit and we will take 80 per cent of it away from you after you have performed your contract." If we had had that from the beginning, gentlemen, in my judgment we would be far more up to date in the absolute necessities of our war program than we are to-day.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will; with pleasure.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman has been informing upon this subject and there came to my mind a thought. It seems that this system as proposed is in the alternative, is it not?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, would it interrupt the gentleman's trend of thought to give a concrete illustration as to how it works out in the alternative? That has been a puzzling question to quite a number of people.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will be very glad to do so. I think I can make it clear in a few words. Let me say, in the first place, that I do not at all disagree that an excess-profits tax has been necessary as a war measure. My criticism against it was as to its principle, and particularly directed against it as a peace measure. I have, for instance, thought that when we shall have won this war, and when we return to a more normal basis and taxes can be reduced, the first tax that we ought to repeal will be the excess-profits tax.

But the excess-profits tax does catch that class of corporations whose earnings before the war were very large. Assume that under this bill the provision is that there shall be both methods in force, the excess-profits tax and the war-profits tax; that all corporations shall make returns under both systems, and then shall pay to the Government the highest rate that can be exacted by either.

It is apparent that those corporations which have run along pretty evenly and which were making good profits before the war, and which have been making good profits since the war began, will, in all probability, come under the excess-profits tax, because there is no surplus in the war year over the earnings in the prewar year. However, the corporation which was making only a small amount—say, for instance, 6 per cent—before the war, and either through enhancement of material or through a contract for providing supplies to the Government they have made 25 per cent since the war, it would come automatically under the war-profits tax and be so assessed. I think that makes it clear.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague permit a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. According to the statement of Treasury officials, about 90 per cent of the corporations that would pay a tax would come under the war-profits tax and about 10 per cent would come under the excess-profits tax.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes. The department furnished us with a lot of very interesting data. They took 22 corporations, among the very largest corporations in this country, typical corporations, some that had been doing very well before the war and some that had been doing not so well before the war; and they found that out of those 22 corporations 18 would pay under the war-profits tax and 4 under the excess-profits tax; and that probably would be a pretty fair estimate of all the corporations in the country.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I, for my own curiosity, made some computations under these schedules myself, and my results seemed to indicate that if the earnings of the corporations were less than the amount of their capital stock, the greater tax would be imposed under the war-profits system, but if the earnings were largely in excess of the capital stock they would come under the excess-profits system. That is, the excess was found under that system. I think the computation will show that to be generally true.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think the gentleman has the right way of basing his figures. In the first place, the capital stock has nothing whatever to do with it. It is only the question of the actually invested capital. And so far as the invested capital is concerned, the same rule exactly applies to the excess-profits tax and the war-profits tax, and the only difference is that under the excess-profits tax we allow only 8 per cent deduction, and under the war-profits tax we allow 10 per cent deduction. That is the only practical difference.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DEWALT. Would not this seem to follow, too, that by the war-profits system of taxation those parties who have been making large amounts of money by the manufacture of munitions of war out of contracts obtained during the war period would of necessity pay the larger proportion of this tax?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They will; and it is the only way we could get at them, I will say to the gentleman. We could not get at them properly and exact a sufficient amount of tax under any other method than the war-profits tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield me some time?

Mr. FORDNEY. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Half an hour, I think.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield such time as the gentleman desires.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. TREADWAY. You have spoken of the example with reference to the 22 very large corporations that would come under the war-profits rather than under the excess-profits tax. Would the gentleman be kind enough to give some information or illustrations relative to the small corporations, the $50,000 to $100,000 corporations, where they would naturally be affected by the class of tax?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That would be very hard to tell. The worst feature of the excess-profits tax has been with reference to that small corporation, the corporation with a comparatively small capital, where the brains and the energy and the ability of the management have been responsible for their profits. Those corporations are at a disadvantage as compared with other corporations, larger ones, which in various ways have been able to pad, either properly or improperly, their capital; and hence the tendency has been to tax under the excess-profits tax the small corporation, which depends, as I say, upon efficiency of management, higher relatively than larger corporations not so efficiently managed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman has said that a large part of the war-profits tax will come from the manufacturers of munitions, and so forth, under Government contracts. Of course the Government can not enhance itself much by the money it pays out itself. That is like trying to pull yourself up by the bootstraps.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know just what the gentleman means.

Mr. PLATT. You say that a large proportion of the excess profits are made by manufacturers of munitions who have Government contracts. How much is that expected to figure in the revenue to be derived from the war-profits tax?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would say to the gentleman that that would be utterly impossible to estimate. Of course I assume that a good many corporations have made large profits out of Governments contracts; but an immensely larger number have made even larger amounts of money during the war who were under no contractual relations directly with the Government.

Mr. PLATT. I have no doubt that is true, but a good many people seem to think that the Government can finance itself out of money which it itself is paying out, which is absurd.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course it is absurd. But it has little to do with the question now under consideration.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the reverse of it would be more absurd. It would be manifest that the Government, spending the money which it is spending, could not hope to raise revenues sufficient to conduct its affairs unless it got a return out of the large profits which come out of governmental activities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Kentucky is exactly right. Under this war-profits tax the war profiteer will no longer be able to revel in his entire gains, for now comes the Government and exacts from him 80 per cent of his profits, which the Government's demand for war materials has made possible.

There is another item of this bill to which I want to devote a moment. The tax imposed by it is so insignificant and the proposition seems so simple that one unacquainted with the situation might very well pass it by without realizing its immense importance to the successful conduct of the war. It appears in the jewelry section and provides simply that in addition to the tax of 10 per cent on all jewelry there shall be a tax of 10 per cent on jewelry composed in whole or in part of platinum, to be paid by the buyer, with the further provision that the seller shall make a return, giving the name and address of the buyer of each article, a description of the article sold, and the value of the platinum contained therein.

Now, what is the reason or necessity for this provision? Many of you will recall that when the last revenue bill was before the House I offered an amendment to put a prohibitive tax on the sale of platinum jewelry. The reason why that amendment was offered on the floor was because the information which I received as to the seriousness of the situation came after the bill was reported, and I was unable therefore to bring it to the attention of the committee. In spite of this, the amendment came very near being adopted, and in the light of subsequent events, in my judgment, it would have been most fortunate if it had been adopted, because since that time an immense amount of platinum has been manufactured into jewelry and sold to heaven knows whom. If there was a need then, gentlemen, for an ample supply of platinum for the use of this Government there is an infinitely greater need now. Platinum is a unique and peculiar metal. It has qualities inherent in no other metal. Its ductility, for instance, is almost inconceivable. Experts tell us that it is theoretically possible to draw out an ounce of platinum into a wire 1,800 miles long. I can not prove that of my own knowledge, but I have heard it so stated by competent authorities. If that be true, conceive of a platinum wire weighing 1 ounce which would reach from here to Denver.

It seems absolutely unbelievable, but this and other qualities have made platinum a most desirable metal for jewelry setting, for which during the last 20 years it has become more and more extensively used. It was not until 1900 that platinum came into general use in making jewelry. In 1900 platinum was selling somewhere around $15 an ounce. In 1914, at the beginning of the war, it was selling around $45 an ounce. It had gone up 300 per cent in 18 years, and it seems fair to conclude that the great increase in value of platinum has been due in the main to the demand for its use in jewelry. Since then its enormous increase in price has been principally due, of course, to the demand by all countries for it for war purposes, and it is selling to-day for about $105 an ounce. The Government some time ago bought a small quantity of platinum for $105 an ounce. We heard in the committee that platinum scrap was being bought in the market as high as $200 an ounce, and to-day, gentlemen, you can not get platinum in any but insignificant quantities at any price. It is becoming increasingly difficult to obtain it day by day.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman describe briefly the uses to which the Government puts this metal?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; and I shall be very glad if the gentleman from Connecticut, who has wide knowledge on this subject, will confirm what I say.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman also state for our information where platinum is mostly found?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will. I come now to the very crux of the situation. While platinum is desirable and convenient for making jewelry, it is absolutely indispensable to any government in making war. The belligerent nations from the beginning have been literally combing the earth for it, and since the debacle of Russia, from which most of it comes—practically all, except a small quantity from Colombia—it is becoming ever harder to procure. Why, it is said that in Germany they are taking platinum fillings out of people's teeth for the use of the Government.

Platinum is an absolute necessity for aeroplane engines, for automobile engines, and the like. It is a necessity for the manufacture of T. N. T. and other high explosives as they are being manufactured to-day. There has been some difference of opinion, as illustrated in the hearings before the committee, as to whether substitutes can not be obtained for platinum in the manufacture of some high explosives. It may be true that it is possible to do so, but it would also be theoretically possible to carry army supplies from San Francisco to New York on mule back. At the very best it would add immensely to the cost of making modern high explosives, and it is an absolute necessity for the making of nitrates by the process that is to be used in all Government nitrate plants.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Then, the tax on platinum jewelry ought to be practically prohibitive?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was the amendment I offered a year ago. It is being said by some members of the jewelry trade that it is through machinations of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and myself that this unjustifiable and onerous tax of 10 per cent has been imposed on platinum jewelry. As a matter of fact, the Ways and Means Committee have adopted this tax unanimously, and it is going to stay in this bill. The great advantage of it is that, while it will produce probably only a small revenue, the main thing is that it will give this Government absolute knowledge of where any platinum bought for jewelry purposes will be from now on.

Only two or three days ago the Director of the Mint sent out a prayer to all the women in this country who own platinum jewelry to bring their platinum to the mint and the Government would pay them for it at the current rate. We do not know where the platinum is to-day, and the main thing that this provision will accomplish is that hereafter we will know where the platinum is, so that we can get it if we want it, and the chances are we may soon get hold of it all.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the query of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] is not a pertinent one? If a person wants to pay $250 for a platinum setting in a ring, then 10 per cent would make that $275. Does the gentleman think that would have a deterring effect on the person who wanted to pay that much for a ring? Would it not be better to impose the higher tax that the gentleman from Ohio suggested when the first bill was up?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have been in some doubt about that, but it seems to me that the desired effect will be accomplished by this provision, because people are put on notice hereafter, having paid the tax at the time of purchase, that the Government will have their names and addresses, which will be immediately furnished to the collector of internal revenue in the district in which they live, and to that extent it will tend to deter large sales. This is not a case of absolutely destroying the industry. It is a case of putting the people of the country on notice.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Did not the committee have in view also the thought that the executive branch of the Government now had sufficient power to take over the platinum, and that this gave them an additional facility of knowing where it is located?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; that is the theory on which we ought to legislate wherever possible, not to use the tax necessarily to destroy industry, to so regulate it as to give the Government all necessary information to enable it to control the situation.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Had the committee any information as to how nearly Germany would be able to secure control of the Russian mines in which the platinum is mined?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The question the gentleman from Indiana has asked is impossible to answer with any real definiteness, but it is generally understood that Germany has had almost complete control of the platinum industry of the world. I wish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was here, because he could answer that question more specifically; but we understand that Germany is in control of that part of Russia in which the platinum mines are situated. Practically the only way in which we can now obtain platinum is from people who are smuggling it out of Russia, and that is the only way any country can get it, except Germany.

There has been some question as to the necessity for platinum in making nitrates. That arose from the testimony of a gentleman who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, a member of the platinum section of the Council of National Defense, who made the statement that 99 per cent of the nitrates made in this country were made without the use of platinum at all. That was literally true, in a sense. But it was based solely on the fact that the Government has not so far made any nitrates except out of nitrate of soda imported from Chile, which does not require the use of platinum.

The reason why we are spending such enormous sums to provide Government nitrate plants is because we are now deprived of a large portion of our former supply of Chile nitrate, and we are forced now to make our nitrates as Germany makes her nitrates, by the use of platinum. We could not produce nitrates at the Muscle Shoals plant or the two Ohio plants now being built, or any Government plant without the use of platinum.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What progress is the Government making in those nitrate plants?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I would like to talk about that; I enjoy the discussion of that subject, because it brings up my old friend, the Muscle Shoals project; but I shall not go into it to any extent to-day. In that connection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was not absolutely accurate when he said yesterday that the work on the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals had been given up. The plant is going ahead. It is the work on the dam that is stopped, because the dam has been officially declared to be a nonessential.

Gentlemen will recall that several years ago Congress authorized the expenditure of $20,000,000 for Government nitrate production. The law provided that it could only be spent for a Government owned and operated nitrate plant or plants. About $6,000,000 of that was spent, mostly in experimentation with smaller nitrate plants, and it was only just after the Government had taken some $45,000,000 out of a fund which was not even remotely contemplated to be used for making a nitrates plant that the rest of the $20,000,000 fund was drawn on.

The $14,000,000 that remained was taken out of the fund and used for building dam No. 2 of Muscle Shoals water-power project, the theory being that this was to furnish the power by which the big nitrate plant would be operated. I pointed out at the time that the War Department had stated that it was utterly impossible to have this dam completed within four years and that it would cost very much more than the $14,000,000.

The effect was, as I tried to point out, you were building a nitrate plant at a place where the power could not be developed for more than four years, a ridiculous proposition as a war measure. Therefore, I confess that when I saw that the Secretary of war had declared that the work upon this dam should stop because it was a nonessential for war, I was very greatly pleased, not because I am opposed to the building of nitrate plants—on the contrary, I have vigorously advocated them, but in locations where there was power in actual existence to operate them. The two Ohio plants have been located where they have the power and the power is ready. The Muscle Shoals plant was located where there could be no power for four years at the earliest to make nitrate for use in this war. Therefore this plant will have to operate when it is finished partly by the use of steam power, for which the Government is building a large plant, and partly by use of water power generated by a private corporation upon another river 90 miles away. That is the situation in regard to the Government nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, for which we are expending over $45,000,000 and for which we will have to expend a good deal more if the plant is ever to be operated by water power developed there.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Granting that it is true, as it undoubtedly is, that platinum is an absolute necessity for the manufacture of nitrates and also in aeroplane construction, is it not also true that the jewelers can get along without platinum in their process and use gold and other metals?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, absolutely.

Mr. DEWALT. Then is it not clearly an injustice for them to complain about the provisions of this bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. To my mind there is no justice in their complaint whatever, and yet it is a very lively complaint, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. KREIDER. Is the gentleman from Ohio prepared to give an idea as to the quantity used by the jewelers in the trade?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can not get that for the very reason that it has never been kept track of. We do not know. I will get along a little bit further and come more directly to that point, however. In view of its absolute necessity for war purposes, it is pertinent to inquire whether the Government now has in its possession or under control a sufficient supply of platinum for its war needs. Far from it, gentlemen. The fact is that to-day, according to the admission of responsible Government officials, we are something like 20,000 ounces short of the supply necessary for the war program, and that not counting the extra needs which will develop when the Government nitrate plants begin to operate. The Government has taken some cognizance of the situation, but from the beginning it has been slow to act, and, in my judgment, has not gone nearly far enough. The manufactured platinum in the hands of a few jewelers has been commandeered, and very recently the use of platinum in the manufacture of jewelry has been prohibited, but nothing yet has been done to discourage the sale of existing stocks or to ascertain into whose hands these stocks go, so that we will be able to commandeer it there, if necessary. You must choose, therefore, between the interests of a few platinum jewelers who represent some 300 or 400 concerns only out of over 35,000, and the interests of your Government. I shall not stop now to debate whether or not it is the highest essence of patriotism to buy expensive jewelry at all during the war. The Treasury Department advised a tax of 50 per cent upon jewelry for the avowed purpose of discouraging its sale, but we did not go so far. Admitting it to be proper that the fair sex should have new gems and precious stones during the war, is it asking too much that those gems be set in gold or some other metal at least until the war is over?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I am interested in hearing the gentleman say that platinum is perhaps the best metal in which to set gems. Is it not the fact that it is the ugliest thing that can be used for that purpose, and is not the only reason for its use the fact that it is so expensive?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The only reason men buy it is because their wives or sweethearts want it, but I do not want to debate with the gentleman its aesthetic qualities.

Mr. PLATT. It is just as ugly as lead, and women would use lead if it cost as much as platinum.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Nevertheless, it is fashionable as a setting for jewelry, and from the beginning of the formation of this bill, in fact from the beginning of the war, there has been a determined effort here in Washington and elsewhere to prevent the enactment of any legislation or of any regulation which shall in any way interfere with the sale or production of platinum jewelry. There is much more to be said on this subject, but so far as I am concerned I shall reserve until we come to the platinum section in case any one may have the temerity—I think that is the right word—to move to strike it out. I hope that no such effort will be made, but as I have said, these platinum jewelers are well organized and insistent and they may find a champion, but if I know the temper of this House we will never at this stage permit the financial interests of a few men to run counter to the interests of the American people in our war program. [Applause.] To my mind, there is no more essentially antiboche paragraph in the entire bill. No one thing could happen which would bring greater joy and comfort to the enemy than the knowledge that the Government of the United States had found itself short of platinum.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. DENISON. If it is as important as the gentleman stated, why did not the committee adopt the schedule proposed by the Treasury Department and make it 50 per cent?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was 50 per cent on all jewelry. It made no discrimination as against platinum jewelry.

The passage of this bill, my colleagues, means sacrifice, sacrifice to be borne to a more or less extent by a very large mass of the American citizenship. It means a reduction of unproductive expenditure, a diminution in the scale of pleasant living, a renouncement to a great extent of many luxuries which have come to be necessities almost to many of us. It means a return to the graver and more sedate mode of living of our fathers in the times of the earlier struggles and perils of the Republic. I feel confident that the American people are ready to make these sacrifices. If complaint comes it will come only from those who are not yet awake to the gravity of the situation or whose love of luxurious ease is paramount to their love of country. The vast majority of us have arrived at the point where we believe that no sacrifice that we can make is too great if only it shall speedily result in bringing the enemy to his knees and compelling him to sue for peace upon terms to be dictated by ourselves and our brave allies. [Applause.]

The American giant is now wide awake. He is anxious to do penance for his lethargy and his failure to arm himself when danger imminently threatened and he is prepared now to strip even to the buff to win the fight. We know now full well, if we were slow to realize it at first, that the triumph of the Hun would mean death not only to the pride and prosperity and prestige but to the very soul of the American Republic. [Applause.] I ask you, my colleagues, to look upon two pictures, one of American origin of more than half a century ago, the other of German origin and brand new. I ask you to contrast the two and say whether the first does not accurately reflect the soul of America from the beginning of our existence as a Republic and the second the soul of Germany since her enthrallment by the dynasty of the Hohenzollerns.

In the early sixties Abraham Lincoln, hearing that the five sons of a woman in Massachusetts had been killed in battle, wrote her the following letter. Of course it is familiar to all of you, and yet I will read it, because so sublime are its sentiments, so lofty its inspiration, that its words can not be too often repeated, and especially in times like these. Lincoln wrote:

> I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the adjutant general of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I can not refrain from tendering to you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the agony of your bereavement and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

Thus speaks the chief by popular suffrage of a great Nation. Thus speaks the man of tender heart, the man bowed down with woe for the sufferings of his countrymen. Does it not seem to you in these few simple but wonderfully beautiful sentences lies revealed the very soul of America?

Contrast with this a letter sent by direction of the Kaiser to a German mother, nine of whose sons had perished in battle, a woman who is now destitute and begging for food, they say, on the streets of Delmenhorst-Oldenburg. This letter runs as follows:

His Majesty the Kaiser hears that you have sacrificed nine sons in defense of the fatherland in the present war. His Majesty is immensely gratified at the fact, and in recognition is pleased to send you his photograph, with frame and autograph signature.

Thus speaks the chief by divine right, as he blasphemously calls it, of a great nation. Thus speaks a man with heart of flint, whose selfish lust for power dims all thought and care for the sufferings of his people. Not a suggestion, not a word of sympathy for the bereaved mother, but only the arrogant assumption, bred by his sublime egotism, that the photograph of him whose insane ambition to rule the world has brought these woes upon her and upon the whole human family would be ample compensation for what she had suffered for the fatherland. From this letter it seems to me is reflected most accurately the soul of that modern Germany whose people, gagged and bound, pay bloody tribute to the insatiate ambitions of the house of Hohenzollern.

Look upon these two pictures, my colleagues, the American mother of Lincoln's time and the German mother of Wilhelm's and reflect what the triumph of German arms and kultur would mean to all the fathers and mothers of America. I wonder whether the "All Highest" smiled in his sleeve when he sent that precious reward to the mother of the nine dead sons at the cynical reflection that he had thus placed her under an obligation which she could never return in kind; for if there is one thing certain about this war it is that, come what may, the six sons of the Kaiser will be preserved undamaged for posterity. [Applause.]

If any one of them has been on the actual fighting line we do not know it. If any one of them has been in a position of real peril we have yet to hear of it. Certainly not one of them bears a scratch. No citizen of the embattled nations, not even the son of the great pacifist, Henry Ford, is more immune from bodily harm than these six young Huns. [Applause.] Come what may, this much is certain, that last of all the Wilhelms in Germany to give his life for the fatherland will be Wilhelm, the kronprinz; the last of all the Fritzes to go will be Eitel; so with the Adelberts, the August Wilhelms, the Oskars, and the Joachims.

The sons of Presidents of the United States have been less timorous. Their love for the land of their fathers has impelled them farther toward the battle front. I hope you will pardon me if it seems lacking in taste—but I am mighty proud of them [applause]—when I say that all four sons of a former President of the United States have been on the real front, three of them married men with children, and under no conceivable obligation to go. One of them has perished gloriously on the field of honor. Two have been severely wounded, one so severely that he has been invalided home. The other, while unwounded, has been decorated for conspicuous gallantry in action. [Applause.] The son of the only other living ex-President of the United States is on the battle front. If Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, had been blessed with sons of anywhere near fighting age, they would be on the battle front. [Applause.] And if they had been unharmed so far it would not be because they sought or obtained immunity by reason of the exalted position of their father.

When the war is over and Germany is brought to her knees the heir of the throne of Hohenzollerns and his brothers will be held to a strict accounting by those who still remain out of the millions of Germans who have given their lives—to an odious cause, it is true, but still the cause of their fathers.

Our boys at the front are doing magnificently. If anyone doubts it, let him ask Wilhelm, the kronprinz, or Hindenburg, or Ludendorff. They have more than lived up to the expectations of the most sanguine. Man for man, the American soldiers in Europe have proved themselves to be the best fighters in the world. [Applause.] Every American, at home or abroad, has his duty to perform. By most of us it can be performed more effectively in some other sphere of action than in the line; but we must not for a moment forget that the success or failure of our cause depends upon the men who do the actual fighting. It is our duty to see to it that every resource of the country shall be placed behind them. For this the prime requisite is money, money in quantity so vast that it can not be procured unless every American citizen shall sacrifice and save.

This the American people must do to pay the taxes imposed in this bill. This they must do if the approaching issues of liberty bonds, and others to follow, are to be successful. This they will do. Who can doubt it? For a wave of patriotic fervor is sweeping over this country, unexampled in our history, a wave which has already engulfed some men in high places whose hearts were suspected, at least, of not being wholly in this war, and which in the near future will have swept away many another. A wave which, best of all, only a few days ago forced the conviction and severe punishment of that sinister band of plotters against the welfare of the United States who call themselves the I. W. W. [Applause.]

Let this high spirit of patriotism animate us here in this House in whatever we do. Let it continue to banish all selfish and partisan spirit from our deliberations and make us as brothers in the cause, so that we may stand shoulder to shoulder, Northerner and Southerner, Republican and Democrat, united indissolubly by the passionate resolve that government of the Kaiser, by the Kaiser, and for the Kaiser shall perish from the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, taxes are said to be unpopular, but that is only true where the purpose for which they are raised is unjust or the manner in which they are levied is unfair. The American people do not object to paying taxes if they approve the purposes for which they are assessed and the manner in which they are levied. Therefore I want to congratulate—I started to say the committee that drafted this bill—but, rather, I congratulate the country, that in framing this present tax measure the purposes for which the taxes are to be raised are patriotic and the manner in which they are distributed is just. I shall support the bill without apology.

I should not have said anything at this time if it had not been for the remarks yesterday of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], who went out of their way in order to, I take it, make political capital in their own sections by asserting that they wanted a special tax levied on cotton. I am constrained to believe that there is no man in this House of the two or three who have advocated that form of a tax and the two or three others who have introduced bills looking toward the taxation of cotton that expected such a measure would become a law or that any respectable number of the Members of this House would support it. I take it that from whatever section the gentleman may come he realizes there are certain fundamental, underlying principles of fairness and justice that would not warrant the laying of a special tax upon a special product of a special section of this country.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BAER. How about fixing prices on a special product raised in a certain section and not on other products?

Mr. CARAWAY. That never happened. That is the answer to that.

And the only thing that I regret is that this agitation for such a tax discloses this, that there must be some sentiment, however insignificant, in the respective districts of those gentlemen that persuades them to believe they may make political capital and advance their own interests by advocating a tax on cotton.

To start with, I want to make this assertion, that there is no section of our country that has profited so little in a financial way by this war as the cotton-growing section. There is no section of this country where the people have felt the burdens of this war so heavily individually as the cotton-growing people. The cotton crop of 1914, the second largest crop this country ever grew, was produced at a cost of 10 to 12 cents a pound and sold at 5 or 6 cents a pound. The cotton growers of the South lost in 1914, on account of the conditions incident to this war, more money on that one crop than this tax bill will cost the people of their States.

The cotton growers appealed to the Government for one of two things. They wanted transportation to move the crop or they wanted money to enable them to carry the crop until conditions would make it possible to market the crop at something near the cost of its production. They were denied both. I know of many men whose every dollar, the accumulations of a lifetime, was swept away in that one crop, because they could get neither transportation to move the crop nor money to carry it over until conditions should be such as would enable them to market it.

Now, I want to answer the gentleman [Mr. BAER] right here who asked me about fixing the price of products in one section and not fixing the price of products in other sections. A long time ago, without any excuse on earth except the desire to benefit the people of another section, a tax was laid on oleomargarine, a food substance made almost exclusively of cottonseed products. It has cost the cotton growers more than a million dollars a year. Whatever returns it yielded went into the pockets of the dairy people of another section. I never thought it was quite fair, but I never had any patience with anybody who would whine about a discrimination in one section as against another section and seek political advantage thereby, although for years and years we have been burdened by a tax that nobody on God's earth would undertake to say had any excuse for its existence except to keep cotton products from coming into competition with dairy products of another section.

Again, the Food Administration last year fixed the price of cotton seed, that is grown exclusively in our section. Cotton seed was then selling for more than $80 a ton when this price was fixed. I know it, because I am a grower of cotton and I had sold cotton seed at that. It was then selling for more than $80 a ton; but, as I say, the Food Administration fixed our cottonseed price at $60 a ton.

The Food Administrator, I repeat, fixed the price of cotton seed at $60 a ton. Cotton seed was selling at $80 a ton or more then, and that was at the opening of the season. The cotton seed goes up in value as the season goes on, because the seed becomes drier. Last year's crop was the second shortest this country ever produced. It is fair to say that at the time the Food Administrator fixed the price of cotton seed at $60 it was worth in my section $100 a ton. I paid $100 a ton for cotton seed in the past spring to plant.

There was a loss to the cotton grower of at least $40 a ton. Ordinarily you get half a ton of cotton seed out of a bale of cotton weighing 500 pounds. There was a loss in the value of cotton seed to the extent of $20 a bale. That $20 was taken out of the value of every bale of cotton that the cotton people of the South grew on account of the fixing of the price on cotton seed, and when you stop to consider that that represents a loss of $20 per bale of practically the only crop grown by the majority of the people of our part of the country, you will see what an enormous toll it took from the products of the people living in the South, and it was given to the people of all the country as a food product.

We are not complaining about it. The price of cotton seed has again been fixed at from $61 to $72 a ton. If it were not for that price fixed by the Government cotton seed would bring what I paid for it myself last spring, $100 a ton. Still I have yet to have the first man from my section write me a letter complaining of this burden. The people of the South are willing to make this sacrifice to help win this war, and, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to the contrary notwithstanding, they are not shirkers, considering the amount of money that they have. I make the assertion that they have bought more liberty bonds and more war-savings stamps and have made a fairer return on their income taxes than some men who live in other States, because the records of the Treasury will disclose that those men have had their accounts recast for them, and one concern in the gentleman's State was short in its accounts to the Government, as I recall, more than $20,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. As to fixing the price of linters, out of which explosives are made, linters were selling at 8 cents a pound and when they made the contract with Dupont they reduced the price and fixed it at 4.67 a pound.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes. And the committee appointed by the administration to agree with the spinners of cotton on a price for the finished product recently came to an agreement, and either the effect of that agreement or the threat made by gentlemen on this floor to fix the price or to tax cotton took $22.50 out of the price of every bale of cotton the farmer had to sell. Now, the crop is estimated at 11,500,000 bales. Multiply that by $22.50, and you will see something of the loss resulting from the sectional talk or what fixing the price of cotton at less than its cost or taxing out of existence has cost the cotton growers of the South this year.

Let me say this one thing further and I am through: Seventy per cent of the cotton is grown by Southern negroes. I have always thought the North looked upon the negro as its special ward. He certainly swears allegiance to the gentleman's party, and if he takes the trouble to pay a poll tax he votes the gentleman's ticket; and this loss of $350,000,000 last week to the cotton growers came very largely out of the negroes of the South. The gentleman has rewarded them for 50 years of loyalty to his party by taking practically every cent they have.

Now that is not all. If you gentlemen really imagine you can destroy the cotton growers of the South without reacting injuriously upon the people of the North, you are mistaken. The cotton growers, of whom I happen to be one, spend all they get, because we want to go into the spring in debt. Every dollar that we get is used to buy the things that you produce, either on your farms or in your factories, and we have always paid you all the products were worth. You never ran any eleemosynary institutions when it came to selling down our way. Now the more we get the more you get. That has always been true, but if you want to drive us out of growing cotton, bless your hearts, we can grow corn cheaper than you can, we can grow cattle cheaper than you can, because you feed six months each year and we only feed but two. We can grow wheat, and we can grow everything that you produce and grow it cheaper than you do. If you make it impossible for us to grow cotton, your great market will be gone. We will be doing better than we have done before, our bank accounts will show it. You alone will suffer. And that is not all.

There is a very strong agitation going on now all throughout the South among the negroes to leave the plantations and go North, where the wages in the factories and mines and workshops are infinitely greater than the profit from the growing of cotton. That condition has become so acute that in my own section now the planters are trying to get Mexican labor to gather this present crop. The negroes are going to your section and are going into the cities, where they are ill fitted to cope with the conditions that will confront them there. They are going to disturb labor conditions in every factory in your section, and bring to your white people infinite trouble because you do not understand them nor they you. If you want to invite that struggle, if you want to destroy a whole race and in destroying them destroy yourselves industrially, why bless your hearts, go ahead with this agitation to tax what little profit there is out of cotton growing, because, as I say, 70 per cent of it is grown by negroes, and they are infinitely less prosperous than the people who work in factories and mines in your section. When you pull down the temple on our heads, you destroy yourselves with it. Now just stop and think seriously. I have no fear of this proposition passing. I know it is not going to pass. I know there is too much patriotism in this House for any considerable number of its Members to vote for such an outrageous proposition as to tax the special product of one section. I do not believe the gentlemen who advocated it had any expectation of its passage, or really believed that it ought to pass. But you can do as much harm by agitation as you can by legislation. You have already agitated $350,000,000 out of this cotton crop, and most of it falls upon the helpless negro race, who have repaid your acts of neglect by half a century of unswerving loyalty. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] such time as he desires. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a little surprise to the criticisms that my colleagues on the committee have been making against certain official activities of the administration during the present war. I was reminded, however, that while it may be that no government is as good as it might be, no critics of governments are as virtuous as they pretend to be. I do not desire at this time to undertake to make reply to certain criticisms which I think could well be answered, and portions of which I do not think were in good taste unless the entire facts had been gathered and presented, along with a helpful suggested solution of whatever evil was complained of.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to append to my remarks a memorandum on the publicity of income-tax returns.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, Congress is now confronted with the solemn duty and the unusual responsibility of considering a measure which would levy a larger amount of taxes than has ever been imposed in the history of any nation. This tremendous undertaking on the part of the American people has been made necessary by the war for the suppression of rampant German militarism. The people of the United States, acting as a unit, are capable of doing big things, of meeting big responsibilities, and they will patriotically and unflinchingly shoulder this war-tax burden—one that no other country, past or present, could undertake. Next to fighting in the front lines, there is no better test of patriotism than the willingness of the citizen cheerfully to pay the maximum amount of taxes for the support of the Government in its prosecution of the war. On the other hand, the lack, or the degrees, of patriotism can no more quickly be detected than in the person who complains of, or resents, the payment of his fair share of an imperatively high war-tax levy. Especially since the stupendous plans and purposes of the German autocracy to dominate first Europe and Asia, and then the Western Hemisphere, industrially, financially, commercially, socially, and politically, have so fully and clearly unfolded themselves, no intelligent person with a spark of patriotism or with the slightest love of liberty will hesitate to place both life and property at the disposal of his Government in this time of supreme crisis. [Applause.] Even the casual reader now knows that from the day of the Potsdam conference on July 5, 1914, world conquest and world domination were deliberately decreed by the ruling powers in Germany, and have since been vigorously prosecuted by the German and its allied armies. The most ignorant person is now familiar with the uncivilized, savage, and barbarous methods employed by the German Government in waging this unholy, outrageous, and unspeakable war of conquest. For brutality and inhumanity, for duplicity and false pretense, for rape and robbery, for piracy and fiendish cruelty, for the malicious destruction of innocent lives and property, for the deliberate violation of the inalienable rights of both nations and individuals, for the utter and contemptuous disregard of every vestige of right, justice, honor, fair dealing, and moral sense, the conduct of the German overlords from the day they plotted and precipitated this world war has been without parallel and without comparison, and has brought upon their heads a universal judgment of criminal infamy which a million years of atonement can not remove. [Applause.] Talk about "peace by negotiation"! How can you negotiate any question with scoundrels and villians, with assassins and freebooters, with highwaymen and desperadoes? They must first either be killed or disarmed, and then let honorable men speak and act for their nation at the peace table.

Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States has thus far financed the war on sounder and wiser lines than any other nation. It is true that in so doing we had the benefit of the experience of other countries which had previously entered the war. It is a matter of keen satisfaction that the Treasury has so ably and efficiently met its share of these great war responsibilities, which are the most difficult of all financial responsibilities. Our great Secretary of the Treasury and his able assistants and aids are entitled to unstinted praise for the faithful and highly capable manner in which they have met and solved in the most practical way every problem of war finance coming within the Treasury's functions which has arisen. Congress has likewise promptly, earnestly, and patriotically formulated along the soundest and most constructive lines and enacted into law every fiscal measure, and all others, in fact, that would be helpful or necessary to the most vigorous prosecution of the war.

When a nation once finds itself obliged to enter a war, a few belated critics generally make their appearance and condemn the country for not having placed itself on a strict war basis years before. This class of criticism is really an indictment of democracies everywhere. Experience has definitely shown that in democracies the people, whether right or wrong, have never been disposed to pay enormous taxes for the purpose of building up great armies and navies in time of peace and in anticipation of the possibility of war in the future. England, notwithstanding the severe drawbacks and delays in the prosecution of the Boer war on account of the almost utter lack of army preparations in advance, made no effort later to organize and train an army of any substantial proportions. France and other European countries pursued the even tenor of their way while Germany, before their very eyes, feverishly exerted herself for some years in expanding and developing her great armies and navy to the highest point, and even constructing the well-known network of railways along the French border for military purposes. Notwithstanding, none of these countries made any special or unusual preparation to meet the war for which Germany, in this open and notorious manner, was daily preparing herself. It is true that France was better prepared than other European nations, but she was not at all fully prepared.

Mr. Chairman, it must be admitted that where a country is obliged to enter a war without real preparation the expenses are more or less augmented, for the reason that the demand for supplies and munitions is so urgent that the paramount consideration necessarily becomes one of time rather than one of expense. This unavoidable condition, however, is not the fault of the Government, but is naturally incident to the policy universally pursued by democracies in the past. It is difficult to forecast the probable policies of this and other countries as to the maintenance of large armaments in the future. It is plain, however, that what the world desires hereafter above all else is security against future wars. It is equally plain that if some efficient agency, other than armed force, which will accomplish this greatly desired end most, can be devised, the policy of national disarmament would be most wise and welcome. This problem will doubtless be measurably determined, as it should, at the peace table. In any event, the "gospel of force" must be forever uprooted and repudiated. It may be said that if general disarmament should fail of adoption, and I hope it may not, the expenses of maintaining substantial armies and navies after the war by the various important countries will aggregate $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000 annually. This amount would pay off the world's war debt within one generation.

Mr. Chairman, the question of taxation, difficult enough in time of peace, becomes increasingly so in time of war. In peace times the people expect and demand both equitable and scientific taxation, whereas in time of war, owing to the far greater revenue demands, the artificial business conditions, and the briefness of the existence of strictly war taxes, the same degree of strictness as to equity or scientific accuracy is neither possible nor entirely expected. It is a matter of congratulation, however, that since our entry into the war all political parties have agreed as to the general scope, nature, and extent of our war-revenue legislation.

In discussing the war-revenue measure in 1917, I said:

In view of the fact that we may be entering a somewhat long war, too much careful investigation and consideration of the principles of sound taxation and all phases of each item proposed to be taxed and the formulation of an equitable and comprehensive initial revenue measure can not well be given. With a basis of taxation thus established on lines broad and sound, one story after another of taxation can be added, if necessary, as the war progresses and our revenue needs increase, without disturbance of business or economic conditions and without the necessity of constantly readjusting or patching up our tax structure. * * * The real and chief ground of complaint against past and present tax laws is not due to high taxation but to inequitable taxation.

In drafting the first war-revenue measure during the spring of 1917 the Ways and Means Committee outlined the general policy, since pursued, of imposing taxes for war purposes as much as possible on wealth, luxury, pleasure, and seminecessities. This is upon the principle that those able to pay must of necessity bear the chief tax burdens, while those more unfortunate persons who hover over the brink of starvation as they go through life can only fight when needed and can not be expected to pay a very substantial amount of taxes.
